Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

The Clemens House/Columbia Brewery District is a late nineteenth century immigrant working-class neighborhood located on St. Louis' north side. All of the sixty-six contributing buildings are residential with the exception of a 1892-1901 red brick brewery complex, a 1896 red brick convent chapel and a 1910 brick stable. The majority of the housing stock was constructed between 1887 and 1897 for multi-family use; the houses are two-story red brick in rows or detached; they are unified by their planar facade, similar cornice lines scale, materials and set-back. Most are embellished with ornamental pressed brick cornices and window and door moldings characteristic of the period: about half feature mansard roofs. Four multi-family flats of similar scale, materials and design were built between 1901 and 1909. An outstanding 1859, two-story red brick mansion featuring a two-story cast iron Palladian portico is included on the District's southern boundary.

Although structural density has dropped considerably in the last decade, much of the District survives with strong, cohesive streetscapes. Approximately half of the houses are occupied and well maintained with minor alterations. The condition of the remaining ones varies from good to fair; deteriorated elements, however, are confined to roofs (Photos #23 & 24) and rear elevations where wood stairs and porches have been removed or have collapsed; in a few cases, rear walls are gone (Photo #21, right middleground). Original wood or brick cornices on a number of houses have been replaced with 1920s brick parapets most likely after a 1927 tornado caused extensive damage on the city's north side. The 1859 Clemens House has been occupied since 1979 by the Catholic Workers and remains in good condition with some deterioration to areas of the cast iron portico. Abandoned since 1969, the brewery is structurally sound and the primary facades survive with little alteration.

Non-contributing Buildings

Non-contributing buildings are marked with an asterisk on Figure #4. They include several one-story rear sheds (Photo #10, right middleground), buildings/additions less than fifty years old and a one-story house which has been radically altered.

Contributing Buildings

Unless specifically noted buildings are in good condition with minor alteration.

1849 Cass Avenue (Clemens House) (Photos 1 through 7)

Overall dimensions of the 1859-60, two-story red brick house (designed by architect Patrick Walsh) are 60 feet by 170 feet; the hipped-roof main body of the house features a central hall plan and extends five bays on the south (principal) elevation and four bays on the east and west (side) elevations; the original two-story wing extends eight bays to the north. Sometime before 1897, this north wing was enlarged with a third story plus mansard story.

The principal (south) elevation features a two-story projecting cast iron portico supported by paired columns (Photo #1). Cast iron quoining and window and door enframements embellish the main body of the house; both first and second story eared window surrounds display female heads (Photo #2); entablatures cap first story windows and segmentally arched pediments crown second story openings. Windows of the north wing are treated more modestly with stone sills and simple cast iron triangular pediments on the west elevation and unadorned segmentally arched openings on the north and east elevations.

A comparison of the exterior of the house today (Photo #1) with its appearance circa 1860 (Photo #3) and circa 1908 (Photo #4) reveals very few alterations. Decorative scrollwork on the facade pediment and Corinthian capitals on second story columns have been removed as have chimney stacks. In 1887, the original wood and iron fence illustrated in Photo #3 was replaced with a ten-foot-high brick wall resting on a stone foundation (Photo #5). The house appears to be structurally sound; portions of the cast iron porticoed facade, however, are rusting and deteriorated (Photo #6).

Noteworthy original interior features include marble fireplaces with iron grates (Photo 7), elaborate classically detailed wood window and door enframements and ornamental plaster coving and ceiling centerpieces executed by Irish-born plaster and stucco artist Porter White (1826-1915) who also received commissions for work in the Old Courthouse, Union Station and the Wainwright Building.

1849 Cass Avenue (Chapel) (Photos 4, 8 and 9)

Constructed in 1896 for the Sisters of St. Joseph, the two-story red brick former Chapel of the Convent of Our Lady of Good Counsel measures approximately 40 feet on the north and south elevations and 110 feet on the east and west elevations. Designed by architect Aloysius Gillick, the building is connected to the Clemens House by a passageway at the north end. Motifs of the Clemens House facade are repeated in the articulation of the chapel with wood trimmed porch and roof pedimented, paired stone Ionic portico columns and paired brick pilasters at the second story (Photo #8). The terra cotta tympanum of the portico features a fine Madonna and Child rondel surrounded by foliate ornament (Photo #9). East and west (side) elevations are articulated with two-story brick pilasters which mark bays of segmentally arched first story windows and round arched second story openings. A small two-story semicircular bay with a conical roof projects at the north end of the east elevation. Exterior alterations have been minor and confined to the primary facade. A comparison of the building as it appeared circa 1908 (Photo #4) with its condition today (Photos #8 & 9) indicates the removal of the horizontal framing member of the roof pediment and bricking-in of the circular window in the pediment tympanum. The second story rondel over the portico is boarded and corrugated metal conceals the entrance door.

Built circa 1869 by Irish-born laborer Michael Bowdern. One and one-half stories, red brick (painted red) with upper and lower story entrances on the south elevation. No openings on the west elevation. North (rear) elevation is articulated with a small segmentally arched attic window and an upper story doorway and single segmentally arched window.

1925-23 Madison (Photo #11, second from left)

Built in 1888 by German-born feed dealer John Stevener. Dormered mansard slate roof intact on primary (south) facade but windows and doorways have been altered and cornice is missing. At the rear elevation wood stairs lead to second story flats; three segmentally arched, double hung windows on first and second stories.

1915-11 Madison (Photo #12, left)

Constructed in 1909 by owner Ferdinand Hartmann, a baker; Charles Franke, architect; F. J. Fiebinger & Son, contractor. Red brick fabric with speckled buff brick quoining and basement level on the primary facade. Four angled doorways recessed behind round arches on primary facade; gauged brick arches on second story windows. Galvanized iron cornice is partially missing but parapet (coped with metal) is intact.

Three-story red brick store and dwelling constructed in 1892 by contractors Bothe & Ratermann at a cost of $10,000. First story storefront on the primary facade is boarded and covered with permastone; second story windows and cornice feature ornamental pressed brick detailing. The three-story east elevation extends seven bays with segmentally arched windows (now boarded) and a corbeled brick cornice; a first story, wood framed entrance is classically detailed; the two-story, three-bay north end of the building features a first story cast iron storefront (now bricked-in) with a Christopher & Simpson foundry imprint.

Constructed in 1888 by owner/contractor George Bothe. Two-story red brick now painted white. Corbeled brick cornice on primary facade is embellished with small pressed brick ornamental blocks.

One-story wood rear portion of the house was constructed by 1875 (now covered with rolled sheathing). Mansarded one-story red brick streetfront portion was added in 1887 by Irish-born owner Martin Burke, a teamster; a doorway is located on the east (side elevation. Mansard slate has been replaced with rolled sheathing, now peeling.

Constructed circa 1872 by German-born laborer Johan H. Wernicke and still occupied by Wernicke and two other families in 1900. Original slate dormer (boarded) and corbeled brick cornice on primary facade; recessed doorway and passageway which tunnels through to rear exterior stairs leading to second story apartments.

City Block 2323Columbia Brewery--southwest corner of Madison and North 20th Street (Photos #24, 26, 27 and Figure #1 and #2)

The principal 1892 red brick brewery building measures approximately 128 feet and extends seven bays on the east (20th Street) elevation and 189 feet (seven bays) on the north (Madison Street) elevation. An 1892, one-story red brick Boiler House (55 feet by 55 feet) is joined to the two-story south end of the main brewery building by a non-contributing addition of recent construction (Figures #1 and 2). The primary (east) elevation of the Boiler House is articulated with pairs of round arched openings (boarded) flanked by brick turrets (Photo #25, left). The various interior functions of the principal brewery building (Figure #1) are differentiated on the exterior articulation of the primary facades. The five-story center section (Brew House) of the east elevation is defined by three massive stone battered piers at the first story and two large second story brick arches boldly accented with quarry-faced stone voussoirs (Photo #25). Third and fourth stories are articulated with two-story brick piers terminating with round arches which spring from stone capitals. At the fifth story, four turrets continue the vertical rhythm of the piers below and divide the story into a 2-4-2 rhythm of vertically proportioned rectangular windows with stone transom bars. The upper three stories of the Brew House are exposed on the south elevation and follow the articulation of the east elevation (Photo #25). Joining the Brew House on the south is the two-story Refrigeration section; the east elevation is articulated with three round arched openings (boarded) at the first story and six segmentally arched second story openings (Photo #25). Articulation of the two bay north end of the east elevation (Photo #25, right) is continued four bays on the north (Madison Street) elevation (Photo #26, left). The first story is established by quarry-faced stone round-headed arches. Brick piers rise from a second story stone sill course and terminate in round arched fourth story windows; second and third story windows are segmentally arched; a range of vertically proportioned rectangular windows with stone transom bars are punctuated with brick turrets on the fifth story; a large, three-story turret with a corbeled brick base accents the northeast corner (Photo #26, left). Marking a principal entrance on the north elevation, a large quarry-faced stone round arch springs from stone battered piers (Photo #26). A fine terra cotta tympanum with hops and barley relief ornament survives in good condition (Photo #27). Slender piers terminating in round arches articulate the third through fifth stories; rectangular sixth story openings (bricked-in) are flanked by turrets. The adjoining section to the west continues the rhythm of piers and arches; above the arches, new construction has replaced a row of original rectangular windows indicated in an 1892 drawing of the brewery (Figure #2). The western-most section of the 1892 building (partially visible Photo #26-right) has been altered above third story pilasters (Figure #2). Joining the west wall of this section is a non-contributing, 1939 addition (2026 Madison Street) (Figure #4). A comparison of the 1892 brewery drawing (Figure #2) with Photos #25 and #26 indicates that other alterations have been confined primarily to the cornice area where some detailing is missing and the upper part of the turrets has been removed. The only notable architectural features surviving on the interior are cast iron columns with Corinthian capitals on each floor of the principal building.

Designed in 1901 by architects Widmann, Walsh & Boieslier, the two-story red brick building measures approximately 110 feet on the north and south elevations and 130 feet on the east and west elevations. Two-story brick piers rise from a dressed stone foundation and establish thirteen bays on the north elevation; corbeled brick spandrels separate first story segmental row lock window areas from second story round arched openings. Brick turrets trimmed with stone accent second story bays. Fenestration of the twelve bay east elevation follows that of the north elevation. All but a few windows on both elevations are boarded or filled with cement blocks. The south and west elevations are not visible from the street.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

The Clemens House/Columbia Brewery District is eligible for inclusion in the National Register of Historic Places under Criteria A and C, and is significant in the following areas: ARCHITECTURE: The architectural history of the District illustrates the transformation of a nineteenth century suburban family tract into a densely settled working-class neighborhood complete with industry. The 1859-60 Clemens house within the tract is one of St. Louis' very few remaining ante-bellum mansions; its Italian Renaissance Revival design is distinguished by an extensive use of cast iron for the portico, quoining and window enframements which is unique in the city's domestic architecture. The 1896 chapel which adjoins the house carefully follows the Italianate forms of the earlier building. The District's working-class housing dating from circa 1868 to 1909 are good representative examples of a continuum of vernacular building traditions in the city. All red brick, the buildings are unified by their color, materials, scale and simply articulated facades; many are distinguished by a variety of pressed brick ornament characteristic of the period. The 1892 Columbia Brewery complex and Bottling Plant of 1901 are significant industrial designs of Jungenfeld & Co., prominent St. Louis brewery architects whose work was also represented outside Missouri. Articulated with robust Romanesque Revival forms, the buildings relate to the residential fabric through their red brick masonry construction, pressed brick moldings and fenestration patterns; a fine terra cotta tympanum in low-relief is installed over the main entrance. EDUCATION: Occupants of the Clemens house from 1885 to 1949, the Sisters of St. Joseph of Carondelet provided staff to several large parochial schools nearby and gave instruction to the deaf who boarded in the house. ETHNIC HERITAGE: Early District residents represented St. Louis' dominate nineteenth century ethnic groups, the Germans and Irish, who were an important source of labor for neighborhood industries, contributed skills to the building trades and other crafts, and helped man the city's police and fire departments among other things. By the mid-1920s, a large number of residents were of Italian or Eastern European descent; their occupations continued along lines established by earlier residents. INDUSTRY: A major employer of neighborhood residents, the Columbia Brewing Company contributed to the growth of a leading St. Louis industry and was one of about twenty-five large local breweries whose combined beer production made St. Louis the nation's largest brewing center before Prohibition. Reopened in 1933 and merged with Falstaff in 1948, the brewery continued production until the late 1960s. The company's plant is the only surviving example of at least five major breweries once located on the city's north side and one of perhaps as few as four city-wide.

In March of 1850 the fifty-four block Union Addition was opened by a group of well-to-do St. Louisans including John O'Fallon and Louis A. LaBeaume. Conditions of the dedication of the subdivision -- the largest of the decade and until 1855 outside the city limits -- called for the donation to the city of a ten-and-one-half acre piece of land for use as a "public park or pleasure ground." (The donors correctly expected the city to improve and maintain the narrow strip of open space for future residents whose houses would face the 210-foot-wide expanse.) The city's reservoir (settling basin) had been located on top of a mound six blocks south of the "Big Mound" near Broadway but a new reservoir to serve the population of 77,860 was completed in 1850 just south of the land donated for St. Louis Place Park and north of the 1848 Barret et al. Subdivision. The Walnut Hill Subdivision opened in 1850 (Figure #2). An adjoining reservoir with five times the capacity was built in 1855. By 1858, the Morgan Street horse car line ran from Fourth Street west on Morgan (now Delmar) to 17th (now 20th) then north on 17th Street to Maiden Lane and west to the Reservoir Gardens -- a private park at the foot of one of the settling basins. A city map from that date (Photo #29) illustrates a collision course of grids east of the reservoirs where the former separate town of North St. Louis (easily identified by the three circles) met the expanding city of St. Louis. Street names were inconsistent and, in the case of the numbered streets, duplicated and in inverse order. Even south of Cass Avenue where the grid proceeded in a straight march west from the river, the map maker had to be content with 23rd or 24th, etc. North of Cass, that same street was 18th.

The city's population of over 125,000 by 1858 included growing numbers of German and Irish immigrants. The first German-speaking Catholic parish to build close to St. Louis Place Park was named for the patron saint of Paderborn in Westphalia: St. Liborius. Their first church at Hogan and North Market was built in 1856-57; the first parish school opened in 1859 as did Jackson Public School, an eight-room building with a capacity of 480 students on Maiden Lane. Meanwhile, an impressive mansion designed by Patrick Walsh<sup>1</sup> built in 1859-60 on land acquired by early (1804) St. Louis Irish immigrant and later millionaire John Mullanphy was under construction on Cass Avenue for Mullanphy's son-in-law, widower James Clemens, Jr. and children.

. . . The building is of the Italian style of architecture and presents, as you approach from the south, a noble and imposing facade. The fine, bold projecting portico, with well-proportioned columns, Ionic on the first story and Corinthian on the second, cannot be too highly praised. The edifice is of the dimensions of 60 by 170 feet and contains thirty rooms, consisting of large and splendid parlors, library, dining room, reception room, and elegantly appointed private apartments. . . . The magnificent hall into which you enter. . . the exquisite marble mantle pieces. . . the fine stucco work and delicate fresco painting, constitute notable features of this sumptuous and beautiful mansion. . . .<sup>2</sup>

Born in Danville, Kentucky, in 1791, Clemens was the son of a tavern keeper and landed slaveowner. With profits made buying saltpeter in Kentucky and Tennessee and selling it to the government for the manufacture of gunpowder in the War of 1812, he started a store in Ste. Genevieve, Missouri, in 1815. The next year Clemens moved up river to St. Louis where he quickly became involved in the social and religious life in frontier St. Louis. Considered an eligible bachelor and ladies' man, he was regularly invited to the balls and parties of the founding French families and more recent American settlers.<sup>3</sup> Clemens' first St. Louis store was at the corner of Market and Main Streets. To stock it he made trips at least once a year to Baltimore, Philadelphia and New York. Until the mid-1820s, when part of the journey could be made by steamboat, he rode some twenty-five days on horseback carrying thousands of dollars in cash through the wilderness areas of Illinois, Indiana and Ohio then returned by flatboat to St. Louis with his purchases.<sup>4</sup> In 1826, he wrote proudly to his father that his previous year's sales had been over $30,000. His energy and business acumen did not go unnoticed: Clemens was among those invited to an 1830 dinner in honor of the Governor at Jefferson Barracks.

Clemens' first association with his future father-in-law, John Mullanphy, was through the formation of the St. Louis Marine Railway in 1831. The next year Clemens was elected a Director of the Bank of the United States (which Mullanphy had been instrumental in bringing to St. Louis) and he married Mullanphy's twenty-one-year-old daughter Eliza in 1833. His personal inventory of that year included substantial real estate, slaves, a horse and carriage -- all the trappings of a successful businessman. With the death of John Mullanphy just six months after the marriage, Eliza's share of the inheritance catapulted the newlyweds into great wealth. Clemens retired from trade in the 1840s to manage the family real estate and devote time to his increasing civic responsibilities. He was appointed a Trustee of the Medical School of St. Louis University in 1842, served on the Emergency Committee of the Public Health during the cholera epidemic of 1849 and, in 1850, was one of three appointed by Secretary of the Treasury Corwin to select a site for the new Customs House in St. Louis.

In the 1850s, Clemens also undertook the presidency of the Irish Immigrant Society, long a Mullanphy interest. Eliza Mullanphy Clemens died in 1853 leaving the aging Clemens with a number of willful children to raise. Eliza's sister Anne Mullanphy Biddle had willed thirteen acres of land to the Visitandines and their school and convent completed in 1858 stood just west of the Clemens House. The Visitandines were among the orders founded by the St. Vincent de Paul Society. Bryan Mullanphy (the only son of John's to survive to adulthood) was Vice President of the committee which brought the first American conference of the Society to the United States. Mayor of St. Louis in 1847, bachelor Mullanphy left large sums of money for immigrant relief. (The land upon which the Columbia Brewery would be built is part of the (Bryan) Mullanphy Emigrant Subdivision carved in 1882 from the huge (John) Mullanphy Tract.) St. Louis population had reached 160,733 by the 1860 Census. Sixty percent were foreign-born, the highest in any major city. There were 35 public schools teaching a total of 6,253 pupils for an average of only three years. In 1864, German was added to the curriculum in a number of public schools in an attempt to attract immigrant children; in 1865, St. Liborius opened another parochial school.

Post-Civil War growth was significant but it did not produce the population figure of 310,869 reported in the 1870 U. S. Census, a total invented after Chicago's figure was announced. Although a Mullanphy daughter (Catherine Graham) opened a subdivision near the District in 1874, Plate 52 from Compton & Dry's 1875 bird's-eye view of St. Louis documents the large land holdings in the District still in the hands of the Mullanphy heirs or their charities. The Visitation Convent (#1, Photo #30) was "commended to parents as a first-class education institution, one in which young ladies are strictly guarded and cared for by ladies of the highest character for intellectual and moral qualities."<sup>5</sup> The substantial house and grounds of James Clemens, Jr. can be located at #2. Visible at #3 is the new family home of Mrs. Fredericka Brinkwirth, a widow who brought her son-in-law William Frederick Nolker in as a partner in the Lafayette Brewery after his 1873 marriage to her daughter Louisa. Their house, ". . .of elegant architectural design and finish, a little above and in full sight of the brewery on Cass Avenue,"<sup>6</sup> appears modest in comparison: to the five-acre Clemens estate. The abandoned city reservoirs can be located at #9, just northwest of the Visitation Convent grounds. (A new reservoir on Compton Hill in South St. Louis had been completed in 1871.) Jackson Public School, which by the end of 1870 had an enrollment of almost four hundred pupils, is at #12; the first St. Liborius Church and Schools are at #13 and #14. Fire Station #5 had been built next to the smaller reservoir; a City Market, still called Reservoir Market until at least 1892, can be seen at #7 just west of the edge of St. Louis Place Park which was described in 1878 as "a respectable looking park of 10 acres. It has fine shade trees, flower beds, a miniature lake, gravelled walks and other attractions. It will undoubtedly become a popular resort before many years."<sup>7</sup>

When James Clemens, Jr. died in 1878 at the age of eighty-seven, the overflow crowd at his funeral Mass included both the Governor and the Lieutenant Governor of Missouri. Lengthy obituaries described his sixty-two years in St.

Louis as an astute and successful merchant; a virtually self-taught, well-read and cultured man; an unostentatious benefactor of the needy; a dutiful participant in civic and mercantile progress; the widower of a charming, handsome, intelligent and civic-minded heiress and a man with the interesting and colorful eccentricities appropriate to an octogenarian.<sup>8</sup> Although Clemens had been reconciled with all of his surviving children before his death, he had failed to revise his will from 1867 which left the two daughters who eloped (Helen and Catherine) only $100 each because of their "disobedient and disrespectful conduct"; son Bryan, because of his "extravagant and disrespectful conduct," was left only the income from a $25,000 trust fund. The six heirs divided the estate equitably among themselves. The Clemens Subdivision (Figure #2) opened in 1880 but the Hopkins' Insurance map indicates that all land was still held by the heirs and no lots had buildings as of 1883. Apparently the city had graded and platted the land where the reservoirs once rose and a new street had been cut from the south end of the park at Benton to Madison Street.

In 1887 Clemens' heirs sold the house and grounds on Cass Avenue for $25,000. The new owners, the Sisters of St. Joseph of Carondelet, had an illustrious history of almost fifty years of service in the St. Louis area, enjoying the largess of Bryan Mullanphy in their early years. Irish Catholic children who lived outside the stone walls of the Visitation Academy next door, called the "Castle of Kerry Patch," were taught by the Sisters of St. Joseph who left Cass Avenue each weekday for St. Lawrence O'Toole's, St. Patrick's, St. Bridget's, St. Nicholas and, after 1888, for the new St. Leo's at 23rd and Mullanphy Streets. The Visitandines sold off part of their land for a subdivision which opened in 1887 (Figure #2) but Mullanphy heirs went to court claiming that the proceeds should be theirs as the terms of Anne Mullanphy Biddle's will had been broken. This action, found unsuccessful by the Missouri Supreme Court, was taken in spite of the fact that young ladies of Mullanphy descent had attended the Academy since its 1840s location at Kaskaskia, Illinois.<sup>9</sup>

Population by 1890 had passed the 450,000 mark and the Visitandines decided to move west. Whether or not the announcement of a transfer of land in October 1891 for a new brewery at 20th and Madison Streets spurred their decision cannot be ascertained:

During the past week a $35,000 site was purchased for a new brewery plant at 20th and Madison Streets, where at least $300,000 is to be expended to put up an establishment that will produce 150,000 barrels of beer annually. This will be the third largest institution of its kind in the city. It is of importance for it is a new industry where employment will be given to a great many men.<sup>10</sup>

The parcels had been purchased in the spring of 1890 by John and Jacob Schorr who would build the Schorr-Kolkschneider Brewery (demolished 1969) at 2537 Natural Bridge Road in 1901-02. The Schorrs sold the land at 20th and Madison to Zachariah W. Tinker and Rudolph Limberg. Limberg's father-in-law Casper Koehler had been associated with John Schorr in earlier breweries. Most recently Koehler had been the proprietor of the brewery at 18th and Market Streets just a block away from Tinker's Malt House and spring but had sold to an aggressive syndicate of English investors which purchased eighteen St. Louis breweries in 1889 to form the St. Louis Brewery Association. The papers of incorporation for the Columbia Brewery -- named in honor of the four hundredth anniversary of America's discovery by Europeans -- list six men as shareholders: Casper Koehler, President: 750 shares; Rudolph Limberg (Koehler's son-in-law), Secretary: 749 shares; Zachariah W. Tinker, Treasurer: 1,000 shares; William Lampel (Tinker's brother-in-law): a token one share and Louis Duestrow: 500 shares. Julius H. Koehler, the son of the President, was General Superintendent.

A building permit for a five-story, 186 by 129 foot, brick brewery estimated to cost $130,000 was issued on January 26, 1892, to contractors Bothe & Ratermann whose office (demolished) was a few blocks away at 1834 Mullanphy. (Bothe was living at 1875 Madison in the District; Ratermann's house at 1543 Hogan around the corner from the firm's office is demolished.) Both German-born, the partners are listed in City Directories as carpenters before forming the partnership circa 1886. Parishioners of St. Liborius, the partners made an early investment in land in the newly opened Visitation Convent Subdivision purchasing lots 12 through 15 on North 20th in City Block 2322W in 1887. (They sold the property in 1892 to Cass Avenue brewery owner Louis Brinkwirth who hired architects Jungenfeld & Co. to design the handsome houses on lots 7 through 15, 1700 through 1722 North 20th, in 1896. Bothe & Ratermann were the builders.) The partnership built the 1888-89 St. Liborius Church designed by German-born architect William Schickel, New York, donating funds for the elaborate high altar. They also built St. Stanislaus Kostka Polish Church at 1412 North 20th Street in 1891 and, in 1893, Bothe built a second house in the District himself (1621 Helen, demolished). In addition to the original brewery, buildings still standing constructed by Bothe & Ratermann in the District include the Bottling Plant at 1934 Madison, designed in 1901 by Widmann, Walsh & Boisselier, 1700-22 North 20th, 1901 Madison, 1875 Madison and 1624 Helen (George Bothe & Co.).

Although no architect's name is listed on the building permit, in the Daily Record or newspaper articles from 1892, the brewery was most probably the work of E. Jungenfeld & Co. Frederick Widmann (FAIA), Robert W. Walsh (FAIA) and Caspar D. Boisselier (FAIA) were partners in the firm known from 1885 to 1897 as E. Jungenfeld & Co. and until 1906 as Widmann, Walsh & Boisselier. Widmann (born in Wurtemberg, Germany) came to St. Louis in 1874 and worked as a carpenter's apprentice before entering the architectural firm of Thomas W. Walsh and Edmund Jungenfeld as draftsman. Jungenfeld opened a separate office in 1880; Widmann was his superintendent by 1884 -- the year of Jungenfeld's death. Robert Walsh's training included work as draftsman and architect from 1873 through at least 1881 in the office of his father Thomas -- a major St. Louis architect whose St. Louis career began before the Civil War. (Thomas' younger brother Patrick was the architect of the Clemens House.) Little is known about the training of Boisselier except that he worked as draftsman and architect for unknown firms from 1876 until becoming a partner in E. Jungenfeld & Co. in 1885. The three partners were members of the St. Louis Chapter of the American Institute of Architects by 1895 when Walsh was elected President.

The firm specialized in brewery architecture and designed buildings for the once-great Lemp Brewery, the Green Tree Brewery and the Brinckwirth-Nolker Brewery on Cass Avenue. Anheuser-Busch was also a client in St. Louis and other cities. Widmann, Walsh & Boisselier were assigned the design of the major Machinery Hall at the 1904 World's Fair and were architects of the popular Tyrolean Alps beer garden on "the Pike" at the Fair.<sup>12</sup>

Although proximity to St. Liborius most certainly attracted large numbers of German-born and second-generation German Catholics to the new houses in the District, a diverse collection of other German institutions was located within a few blocks by the time the brewery opened. The First German Baptist Church was on St. Louis Place Park at 2629 Rauschenbach; Eden Methodist Episcopal German Church (north) was at 19th and Warren. Zion German Evangelical Church was at Benton and North 25th; a building which housed the German School Association and Free Community of St. Louis and Bremen was on the Park at 2930 North 21st. The Second German Swedenborgian Church at the corner of St. Louis Avenue and Rauschenbach was also on the Park. Instead of selling off lots on the site of the reservoirs, the city decided to enlarge the Park at the southern edge and middle- and upper-middle-class houses filled most of the lots facing the Park. The really wealthy, including brewer Charles F. Stifel who had a splendid view of the Park, had built on St. Louis Avenue.

With the departure of the proper Visitation Convent and School from Cass Avenue, Archbishop Kenrick purchased the property for $75,000 in 1893 and turned the buildings and six acres over to the Vincentian Fathers. The fathers opened the first Catholic seminary in St. Louis since 1859 at the Cass Avenue institution and named it in honor of the eighty-four-year-old Archbishop. Three years later the Sisters of St. Joseph added a chapel designed by Aloysius Gillick to the Clemens mansion.<sup>13</sup> Deaf students taught by the sisters lived at the house and the hall below the chapel was named the "Sodality Hall for the Mutes." (Fortunately, plans discussed in the early 1890s to build a central Catholic high school for girls on the site of the Clemens House had been discarded.) Together, the Convent of Our Lady of Good Counsel and Kenrick Seminary formed a bullwark of the celibate and cerebral between the predominately middle-class German neighborhood to their north and Kerry Patch to the south.

Although both the Irish and Germans were targets of the growing Prohibition movement, the production of beer was critical to the larger St. Louis economy. Beer had been subject to an excise tax since 1862 and the number of local breweries, partly because of that tax, had dropped from 40 in 1860 to 25 in 1896. Those 25 directly employed 8,000 people and "furnished the livelihood" to 30,000 more.<sup>14</sup> Many were neighborhood businesses with a range of distribution governed by what the horse-drawn wagon could cover in a day. Of the total number of gallons (68,007,358) produced in 1896, three-fifths was locally consumed. Breweries contributed $20,000 in 1897 to help supply the "poor of the city with food, fuel, clothing and other necessaries"<sup>15</sup> and in 1898 brewer Charles F. Stifel donated a statue of Schiller to be placed in St. Louis Place Park. Every effort was made to promote beer as a natural, healthy and even medicinal beverage.

By 1900, St. Louis' population of 575,238 was close to 81 percent native-born. Census figures for the City Blocks included in this District show a neighborhood made up of second-generation Germans and second-generation Irish followed by German-born, Irish-born and a very small sample of residents born in Holland, England, Prussia, Austria, Scotland, France, Hungary, French Canada, Switzerland, Russia and two of the 172 Norwegians in the entire city. All of the foreign-born men were naturalized American citizens; none of the women were citizens. The most prevalent occupations were clerks, bookkeepers, salesmen and salesladies, tailors and seamstresses, workers in the nearby shoe factories, draymen, drivers, carpenters/builders, and day workers with several tanners, carriage and wagonmakers, brewery employees, typesetters, firemen and policemen. Few boys over the age of twelve years were still in school; girls were more likely to be in school for a few more years before joining the work force. Virtually all the widows worked but practically no wife worked outside the home; many working children still lived at home. Fourteen of the at least ninety-two people who lived at 1700-22 North 20th -- the six houses built by brewer Brinkwirth in 1896 as income-producing property -- were born in Germany; four were born in Ireland. The house next door at 1724 North 20th was owned and occupied by German-born Charles Graber along with his German-born wife and her seventy-one-year-old mother. The only other occupant in the house was one Bertha H. Schunt, a twenty-two-year-old niece whose occupation was listed as "servant." Forty-year-old Graber was listed as a brewer, rather than as a brewery employee (bottler, driver, etc.). The majority of the residential buildings in the District were owner-occupied although in contrast to Graber most owners rented apartments in their buildings.

By far the most prosperous family in the immediate neighborhood was former Mayor (1889-93) Edward A. Noonan, a judge who lived at 1835 Madison (demolished).<sup>16</sup> Judge Noonan, a long-time member of the Democratic State Committee, made an unsuccessful attempt to repeat a term as mayor in 1897. A member of the North St. Louis Business Men's Association, Noonan (like Bothe and Ratermann) could have chosen to live anywhere in the city. A number of the houses occupied in 1900 by German-born or second-generation German carpenters and their families are still standing: Gerhard Rueppel lived at 1628 North 19th; Frederick Stiegemeyer was an owner-occupant of the house at 1632 North 19th and rented apartments in the house to fellow German-born carpenter William Kunin and his family of eight. Carpenter Edward Henke's family was one of three households living at 1867 Madison; carpenter Louis Haeckman lived with his family at 1615 North 19th. German-born Conrad Heyninck, another District carpenter, lived at 1631 North 19th as did German-born August Schulte -- one of the stone masons and marble workers concentrated in City Block 2322E. The founder of an important marble and granite company lived in the little house at 1630 Knapp. Theodore G. Schrader (nee Schraeder) came to the United States from Germany in 1868 and established the business in 1871. By 1886, Joseph Conradi (a native of Berne, Switzerland, educated in Rome) was working with Schrader. (Presumably, the high alter for St. Liborius paid for by Bothe & Ratermann and executed by Schrader and Conradi was produced by hand as pneumatic hammers were not invented until 1892.)<sup>17</sup> Conradi left the firm circa 1893 to open an architectural practice. Schraders' sons incorporated the company as T. G. Schrader Sons after their father's death in 1902. The firm was described in 1925 as "one of the leading in its line in the United States."<sup>18</sup>

Next door to the Schraders is the house at 1632-36 Knapp built in 1890 by German-born widow Caroline Ott. In addition to Mrs. Ott, her son and daughter-in-law, the building was occupied by German-born stone mason John Mueller, his wife and seven children plus Austrian-born stone mason Albert Bruess and his family and three other families for a total of twenty-six people. German-born stone mason Joseph Dohle and his family of eight lived nearby at 1720 North 20th. John Seifried, a German-born driver for the brewery with a large family, also lived at 1720 North 20th.

Owners of the Columbia Brewery made major additions to the complex in 1901 and 1902 (Figure #1) and the Columbia was one of two breweries to take out an advertisement in Barney's 1902 guidebook for visitors to the World's Fair. The brewery also placed a prominent advertisement (Photo #31) in the March 1902 edition of the World's Fair Bulletin. Columbia's products shipped by water and rail to neighboring states included Carlsburger, Wuerzburger and Export beer in bottles.

Barrel lager beer was available as Muenchner, Standard and Extra Pale. Some breweries were dismissed by the contemporary connoisseur as "essig fabriks" -- vinegar factories; some employed embalming fluid and foaming agents until after the Pure Food Law of 1906. Even a former chemist of what became Columbia's most popular brew -- Alpen Brau -- recalled: "They don't make beer like they used to, thank God! The sugar and malt left a heavy, gluey taste in the mouth. And the stuff produced unholy hangovers."<sup>19</sup> In 1907, Columbia and eight other local breweries merged to form the Independent Breweries. (By 1915, only fifteen breweries were active in St. Louis.)

Authors of the 1906 North St. Louis publication urged readers to patronize the merchants and institutions in the neighborhood and pointed out the benefits of doing business without spending car fare. Financial arrangements could be made at Northwestern Savings Bank where builder Ratermann had become a member of the Board of Directors or at the new Cass Avenue Bank at 15th Street. Ratermann's former partner George Bothe had resigned from the firm to become the first President of Cass Avenue. (The firm name continued in business as George Bothe & Co. with an office at 1603 North 18th (demolished) and Ratermann Building & Contracting Co. at 1943 St. Louis - demolished.) Changes in the neighborhood were noted in a St. Liborius publication which remarked that by 1916 quite a few of the old families had left and moved west and those who replaced them were not "of the old St. Liborius stock."<sup>20</sup> The Kenrick Seminary/Visitation Convent buildings were demolished in 1916 and the city block became Murphy Park. Two of the newer residents in the District, Herman Dischinger -- a brewery worker who lived at 1724 North 20th and Frederic Uhl -- a brewer who lived at 1730 North 20th, would soon lose their jobs. Scattered among their neighbors with German or Irish surnames were the Wroblewski, Mitulski and Boyanchek names as well as an Italian or two. (By 1924, Italian and Eastern European names in the District would approach 50 percent of the total.)

One of the German families with roots in Paderborn which remained in the neighborhood was that of Mayor (1973-1977) John Poelker's. Poelker entered first grade at St. Liborius in 1918, the year anti-German sentiment forced the nuns to cancel German classes before the end of the term. Poelker recalls that during Prohibition the seven children would return home at 1839 Rauschenbach after Mass and go to the basement to cap beer for their father.<sup>21</sup> Many other families found their "home brew" far better than the "near beer" or soft drinks produced by local breweries. IBC root beer, produced by the Independent Breweries, is the only beverage from Prohibition years to sustain a market after repeal in April of 1933. Giants Anheuser-Busch and Falstaff, which had grown out of Lemp, were the only breweries ready to brew. The St. Louis Brewing Association re-grouped and attempted unsuccessfully to operate out of the Hyde Park Brewery at Florissant and Salisbury. The Brinkwirth family brewery, the Lafayette on Cass Avenue, was demolished in 1937 and the family sold the row of houses in the District on North 20th that same year.

The Schorr-Kolkschneider Brewery closed in 1939. Columbia, however, made a major investment in alterations to their stock house in 1939.

James F. Conway, the city's forty-first mayor (1977-81) moved into the neighborhood at about the same time Mayor-to-be John Poelker moved out. Conway, with Polish as well as Irish heredity, also attended school at St. Liborius where the German nuns kept him in line.<sup>22</sup> At a time when St. Liborius was known nationally for liturgical innovations, Conway remembers a "polyglot" neighborhood where his family, and most others, never owned a car. "We never knew we were poor." The Italian who lived upstairs from Conway at 1911 Montgomery (demolished) was a driver for the Columbia Brewery as once again, the plant provided jobs in the neighborhood. Through the Depression and World War II, the corporation continued to invest money in the brewery, culminating with a $140,000 addition in 1946.

"Slum clearance" began in earnest after World War II and St. Lawrence O'Toole, one of the Kerry Patch churches, closed its doors in 1947. The Comprehensive City Plan published in that year proposed the demolition of the entire District with the exception of the brewery in order to expand "Murphy Park," the Visitation Convent site. In July of 1948, the Columbia Brewery merged with Falstaff which spent an estimated $111,000 in additions and/or alterations at the plant before the end of the decade.<sup>23</sup> In 1949, the sale of the former Clemens House property by the Sisters of St. Joseph marked the end of sixty-two years of services to the community at that location. The new owners, who paid $50,000, were the Vincentian fathers who opened their Foreign Mission Society offices at the house as demolition began for a massive housing project across the street. The first units of the low-income Pruitt-Igoe apartments opened in the mid-1950s. With thirty-three, eleven story buildings and a capacity of 2,868 families, the project attracted attention as one of the largest in the nation. Recent historians suggest that a 1957 tornado which destroyed housing in the West End and Central Corridor created an urgent need that disrupted the careful screening of tenants for the project. Whatever the cause, Pruitt-Igoe gained a reputation for chaos and crime.

The removal of the lace tower at St. Liborius in 1964 can be seen as a harbinger of change in the neighborhood north of Cass. In 1969, Falstaff abandoned the old Columbia Brewery; in the mid-1970s, the plant became the property of the city's Land Reutilization Authority as Pruitt-Igoe was blown up for national television viewers. Many owners in the District sold their property for next to nothing or simply walked away.<sup>24</sup> The statue of Schiller was moved by the city from St. Louis Place Park to a location downtown and talk of a north/south distributor resurfaced. The path proposed would raze the brewery before dipping east, passing close to St. Liborius' doorstep before slicing through the Murphy/Blair neighborhood. In 1978, St. Leo's Church at 23rd and Mullanphy was demolished. Although friends of St. Stanislaus Kostka Church (visible in the background of Photo #26) made a decision in the late 1970s to restore their church as a symbol of the Polish Catholic experience in St. Louis, demolition on Cass Avenue and at the edges of the District accelerated.

Since 1979, the Clemens House has been operated by the Catholic Workers -- a volunteer organization derived from the tradition of help to the homeless begun by Dorothy Day and Peter Marvin in New York City during the Depression. The Workers attempt to provide help based on immediate need rather than according to the bureaucratic guidelines of contemporary social service agencies. Those they serve occupy a house which is notable not only as one of the few homes of the wealthy from the mid-nineteenth century still standing in St. Louis, but also for its lavish use of cast iron.<sup>25</sup> No iron work which is not structural, however, has survived inside the other pivotal building in the District: Everything which could be stripped was removed by a short-term owner from the early 1970s who had planned to demolish the Brewery. Illegal removal of architectural elements, and occasionally buildings, has been a sporadic and almost unnoticed activity in the District until 1983 when the city decided to apply for an Urban Development Action Grant (UDAG) for the Brewery and most of the buildings on North 20th. That action was the first solid evidence that the specter of the highway has been banished.

The tiny house at 1949 Madison, the oldest building other than the Clemens House in the District, was built over a hundred years ago to provide shelter for a family of limited income. It and the house at 1867 Madison are the only remnants from the streetscape before the Clemens and Visitation Subdivisions opened. The Bothe, Ratermann and Schrader names have vanished from the building trade names in St. Louis as have some of their important works. Bothe's modest house from 1888 and the church (both visible in Photo #13) which he and Ratermann built and attended just outside the District still stand. St. Liborius has been listed in the National Register and continues services for a small congregation; a few "urban pioneers" have bought houses on nearby St. Louis Place. Located close to downtown (Photo #32), the District could be the catalyst for rebuilding the neighborhood.

<sup>1</sup>Irish-born Patrick Walsh -- the son of an architect, came to St. Louis in 1857, eight years after his older brother Thomas, also an architect. Information about Patrick Walsh is sketchy, but Thomas Walsh (1847-1890) had a long and important St. Louis career and was architecturally well-educated. Only one other St. Louis building, the Lombard Romanesque Church of St. John the Apostle and Evangelist, is known to be the work of Patrick Walsh.

(In 1896, Gillick designed the larger and more elaborate chapel for the Convent of the Sisters of St. Joseph of Carondelet.) Though the chapel of 1896 coincided with a revival of Georgian Palladian forms, Gillick apparently chose the style to complement that of the earlier house.

as follows: Beginning at the northeast corner of North 20th and Howard Streets; continue eastwardly along the north line of Howard to its point of intersection with the west side of Knapp; thence northwardly along said side of Knapp to its point of intersection with the western projection of the southern property line of 1606 Knapp; thence eastwardly across Knapp and along said property line, across the north/south alley of CB 2322E, along the south property line of 1607 N. 19th, across N. 19th, and along the southern property line of 1610 N. 19th to its point of intersection with the west side of the north/south alley of CB 2334; thence northwardly approximately 35 feet along said alley to its intersection with the western projection of the southern property line of 1615-17 Helen; thence eastwardly across said alley and along said property line to its point of intersection with the west line of Helen; thence southwardly along said line of Helen to its intersection with the south line of Mullanphy; thence northwardly along said line of Mullanphy to its point of intersection with the western property line of 1849 Cass; thence southwardly along said property line to its point of intersection with the north line of Cass Avenue; thence eastwardly along said line of Cass Avenue to its point of intersection with the eastern property line of 1849 Cass Avenue (a distance of approximately 180 feet); thence northwardly along said property line to its point of intersection with the southern line of Mullanphy; thence eastwardly along said line of Mullanphy approximately 55 feet to its point of intersection with the southern projection of the west line of the north/south alley of CB 2335; thence northwardly along said projection and said alley to its point of intersection with the northern property line of 1632 Helen; thence westwardly along said property line and its western projection to its intersection with the west line of Helen; thence northwardly along said line of Helen to its point of intersection with the south side of Madison; thence westwardly along said line of Madison to its intersection with the southern projection of the eastern property line of 1867 Madison; thence northwardly along said projection and said property line to its point of intersection with the south line of Maiden Lane; thence westwardly along said line of Maiden Lane to its point of intersection with the east line of N. 20th; thence southwardly along said line of N. 20th to its point of intersection with the south line of Madison; thence westwardly along said line of Madison to its point of intersection with the western property line of 2034 Madison (a distance of approximately 500 feet); thence southwardly along said line approximately 125 feet; thence eastwardly approximately 115 feet; thence southwardly approximately 140 feet to the north line of Howard Street; thence eastwardly along said line of N. 20th Street; thence southwardly along said line of N. 20th Street to the point of origin.

The above described boundaries were generally determined by substantial demolition at the edges of the district. To the south, Cass Avenue was once a major thoroughfare which separated Kerry Patch from the neighborhood to the north. To the east, demolition on the 1600 block of Hogan has reduced that blockface to two buildings thus that portion of the Clemens Subdivision was excluded. At the north, the boundary was drawn to include the remaining buildings of significance on Madison which help give a strong sense of enclosure within the district. The western edge of the boundary was drawn to include the contributing buildings in the Columbia Brewery complex while the southern and western lines running back to Cass Avenue reflect the strong edge of vacant land and/or buildings of recent construction.
