ARCHITECTURAL DESCRIPTION

Summary

The Cuba City Jail located near the southwest corner of the intersection of Prairie Street and the 300 block of South Main Street in the City of Cuba, Crawford County, Missouri is a one-story, rectangular-shaped, concrete block jail structure completed in 1908. The interior features a primary guard space complete with desk and wood burning stove and a rear cell room with pair of hanging iron bunks separated from the guard room by a concrete block wall and iron door. Facing eastward towards Prairie Street, the primary elevation has an iron door and is crowned with a shaped parapet with projecting lip and inscribed blocks bearing the name "CUBA-JAIL" and "1908." This spare design is accented by visible mortar joints, the iron door, small vent windows, and a projecting chimney. The structure was in use until 1954 and today serves as a museum with limited access. The building has integrity of location, design, materials, workmanship, feeling and association. The setting of the jail has changed over time in that a one-story structure on the same lot, once situated exactly at the southwest corner of the city block (of unknown design and purpose), has since been demolished; the building was not functionally-related to the jail and its absence does not detract from the significance of the building.

Site

The Cuba City Jail is located on original city block number 20 and occupies a site that is generally flat and planted with grass. A concrete sidewalk from the entry extends to the street at the east. A partial foundation of a formerly demolished structure is to the north while residences are to the west and south. It appears that the bulk of the city block had been used for residential purposes historically with the jail included as the only non-residential structure.

Exterior

The Cuba City Jail is a one-story, concrete block structure which sits on a concrete slab. The primary, entrance-bearing, east-facing elevation contains a centralized iron door composed of vertical and horizontal metal strips riveted to a frame with a small window opening located in the upper half (photos 1-2). At the base of the structure are larger blocks upon which smaller-sized concrete blocks are stacked in eight layers. In the eighth layer is the construction date "1908." Above is a raised parapet with projecting lip and is inscribed "CUBA-JAIL." The entire structure is painted white and shows some signs of deterioration and paint chipping (photos 1-2).

The north and south side elevations are defined only by the large block base, the corresponding eight layers of smaller-sized concrete block and an even smaller block at the flat roof. Between the sixth and seventh layer from the ground is a pair of thin, horizontal air/light vents recessed within the walls (photos 3-7; photo 8 shows the condition of the building prior to restoration).

The west-facing rear elevation is composed by the large block base, the corresponding eight layers of smaller-sized concrete block and the smaller block at the slightly gabled roof. A chimney stack projects from the structure and corresponds to a hearth within the structure (photos 3-4).

Interior

The interior of the structure is defined by the concrete floor, the corner hearth, bare walls and ceiling, and the light which comes in from the side vents and primary door. The interior features a primary guard space complete with desk and wood burning stove and a rear cell room with pair of hanging iron bunks separated from the guard room by a concrete block wall and iron door (photos 9-11). Figure 1 illustrates the floor plan of the structure.

Integrity

This structure represents the oldest government-related structure as well as the oldest jail extant in Cuba. The building had fallen into disrepair until being restored in respect of its original conditions between 2004 and 2006. Although again showing some signs of age and general deterioration (i. e. paint chipping and concrete spalling) it is still clearly recognizable as Cuba's 1908 jail. It retains integrity of location, design, materials, workmanship, feeling and association. Although another older, un-related structure once on site has since been demolished its loss does not adversely impact the setting.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Summary

The Cuba City Jail located near the southwest corner of the intersection of Prairie Street and the 300 block of South Main Street in the City of Cuba, Crawford County, Missouri, is eligible for local listing in the National Register of Historic Places (NRHP) under Criterion A with significance in POLITICS/GOVERNMENT. The jail is the oldest remaining city government building in Cuba and it remains essentially unchanged since construction. Replacing an earlier wooden structure which was burned by its inmates, this concrete block "calaboose"<sup>1</sup> was in active use between 1908 and 1954 and is clearly identifiable as a jail today. Built in 1908, this heavy, permanent, concrete block structure is of a spare, utilitarian design defined by a centralized iron door and inscriptions of its purpose "CUBA-JAIL" and its construction date "1908." The interior has "prison furniture" including a wood cot, a wooden desk, and a wood-burning stove which were installed during a 2004-2006 restoration; the original iron and wood jail cell sleeping platforms are intact. The period of significance begins with the construction completion date of 1908, continues through the period of its active use for 46-years, and ends in 1954 when the structure was abandoned. In 1954 a new jail was constructed behind the current City Hall and Fire Station on North Smith Street and the old jail sat vacant. The building retains high integrity and meets the registration requirements set forth in the multiple property documentation form entitled "Historic and Architectural Resources of the City of Cuba, Missouri, 1821-1963" and the associated property type "II-A Public Sector Institutional Architecture."

Background – Cuba, Missouri

Crawford County, Missouri was organized in 1829 and by 1837, the area that later became Cuba was first settled. Two decades later when the town was being surveyed for a proposed railroad line two local families consisting of Robert P. and Mary E. Jamison and C. Wesley and Mary Smith filed an official plat for "Cuba City."<sup>2</sup> As plated, Cuba was comprised of thirty-two blocks divided in half by the proposed railroad line; North Main and South Main fronted the tracks. Street names were different running north and south and changed identity once crossing the tracks. As designed, the new town was a typical railroad town with business facing the tracks and residential was separated. This would change again with the advent of the automobile.

By 1859, the Southwest Branch of the Pacific Railroad was completed through Cuba and by 1861 it had extended to Rolla; the railroad also divided Cuba into two unofficial communities, North Cuba and South Cuba.<sup>3</sup> The majority of businesses located to the north of the tracks but development of the town was slow. On May 12, 1877, Cuba was incorporated as a village and within four years its population numbered almost 400; lawyer and postmaster U. A. Farrow became the first mayor.<sup>4</sup>

Background – Cuba Government & Police

Incorporated as a fourth-class city in 1884, Farrow continued in office until being replaced in 1888 by James A. Green. The city limits were extended during Green's third term in office between 1902 and 1906 and included annexation of sixty acres to the south.<sup>5</sup> Very little is known about the early history and subsequent development of Cuba's police department but local researchers have found that during the mayoral term of James T. Wightman between 1912 and 1914, that he had made great strides to create a full-time position with compensation for a marshal—a position that was paid on a monthly basis.<sup>6</sup> Whitman was cited as stating that "the marshal was to devote all of his time to the job and was to receive fifteen dollars per month as compensation."<sup>7</sup> With the position came overseeing the local jail; when the marshal was not on watch one of his volunteer police men provided monitoring of inmates.

Elaboration – The First and Second Jails

The first Cuba jail was constructed of wood and was subsequently burned by its inmates.<sup>8</sup> Seeing the obvious faults of the restrictive use of wood to hold prisoners, consideration of a new building to be built of more permanent materials came under discussion at the city level. James A. Munro, Cuba Marshal between 1906 and 1908, and W. A. Davis, who served in 1908, were engaged in the government effort to build this new city jail. According to minutes of the City Council and Board of Alderman of the City of Cuba, first mention of the construction occurred on November 26, 1907.<sup>9</sup> Mayor William F. Mitchell, City Clerk James A. Green, and the Board of Alderman comprised of A. H. Tieman, J. C. McClay, John Dowley, A. J. Barnett, John M. Munro, and C. R. Hitch spoke at length about the need for as well as the design of the structure and sent two men to Sullivan, Missouri to measure the dimensions of its masonry jail. Accordingly, Marshal W. A. Davis was forced to deal with local lawbreakers without a place to put them; "how he accomplished his work under these circumstances is not recorded."<sup>10</sup>

A series of city meetings commenced over the following months with a key vote on January 6th to procure a site south of the town; this parcel on lot one of city block twenty was owned by George and Jane Ives and was to be leased by Cuba for a period of 99 years (Figure 2).<sup>11</sup> Then on January 20, 1908 a special meeting was held in which to request that a public meeting be held later in April in order to give the citizens an opportunity to comment on the project. Meanwhile, the Board met again on February 3rd where it was agreed that Cuba would lease the chosen lot for $40 per annum with the sole purpose of constructing a jail on the site.<sup>12</sup> At this same meeting, the Marshall's son (and earlier Mayor between 1898 and 1902) John Manson Munro was appointed to make plans and specifications for the structure. The official contract for the structure was let to William Harrison (William Harmon is named in a second source) in the amount of $322.50 at the March 31, 1908 Council meeting.<sup>13</sup>

The public meeting followed in April of 1908 where a majority vote (114-36) in favor of building the new jail was approved.<sup>14</sup> The Ives property at the intersection of Prairie and South Main Streets would house the new jail. To be constructed of concrete as the weather permitted, the jail was completed before the summer of 1908 (Figure 3). This structure was the second jail constructed in Cuba and was in use until 1954 when the third city jail was constructed behind the 1934 City Hall and Fire Department building. There are no available records indicating who had been imprisoned in the structure, how many had slept within its walls, or what crimes were committed to get free room and board within the jail; many of the city records were in fact destroyed by fire according to local historians and city officials.

The Cuba City Jail and the Growing Town

The role of the Cuba Jail was of great importance in the community and in the correction of criminals committing crimes within the city limits. However, its small size had restrictions of how many individuals could be “safely” stored in the structure. In theory and based on its design the rear cell could technically hold two individuals; an internal door separating the rear cell from the front reception could also serve as a second cell room towards the front of the structure but without the presence of a guard inside it would be difficult to monitor the inmate's activities. The jail, similar to other small city jails in Missouri counties of the same vintage, more commonly served as a holding cell for lesser crimes punishable by a short sentence—for instance to provide a safe place to sleep off the effects of public intoxication. Whereas more serious crimes such as murder were often settled on the spot or by subsequent revenge. The so-called "frontier justice" and public hangings more common in the western states did not find their way into Crawford County to a large degree and with a smaller population the "troublemakers" were often already known and a short sentence would likely set them straight.

During the Mayoral term of Dr. Walter S. Cox between 1914 and 1918, Cuba annexed two large land parcels and thus increased its size.<sup>15</sup> Also during his term the playing of pool on Sundays was prohibited and slot machines were banned. Two stimulating activities that were earlier commonplace, but now illegal, no doubt continued in private circles. One can only assume that the careless citizens would get caught in the act and end up in the local jail with a fine to match. The City continued to develop and in the early 1920s installed its first municipal light system.<sup>16</sup> The early 1930s were marked by some major new construction projects in Cuba including new underpasses beneath Route 66 and for the Frisco railroad, a new public school, and improved sanitation. Ultimately by 1934, and through the assistance of the New Deal projects, a combination City Hall and Fire Department building was constructed (NR listed in Uptown Cuba Historic District, 3-13-2013); previously the city government relied on rented spaces for its administrative offices.<sup>17</sup>

Site Study

Serving as the only city jail for over four decades, a review of Sanborn Fire Insurance Maps is quite misleading. The map for 1924 indicated that the jail fronted Liberty street on city block 19 to the east of block 20; an accompanying structure was adjacent the jail at the corner lot. Addressed as 202 Main Street (AKA 118 Liberty Street – Figure 4), the other structure was a one-story building, eighteen feet high and appears to have been an electric power house using both oil and gasoline fuel. A small one-story dwelling to the south was set back from the street. By 1933, the Sanborn map shows the jail behind a vacant one-story building addressed number 17 Main Street and the dwelling is missing. The jail is on block 20 and facing Prairie Street (Figure 5). The streets were not renamed nor were the city blocks renumbered; and there is no evidence of the building having been moved. In summary, there is no logical explanation for the discrepancy of the jail on two different city blocks and could have simply been the mistake of the map draftsman. Regardless it is located on its original location were built on city block 20, lot 1.

The 1908 Jail's New Life

By the early 1950s, the 1908 concrete jail was considered too isolated from the City Hall which was five city blocks to the northwest in addition to having inadequate space to hold prisoners. It was ultimately decided to construct a new, third jail adjoining the rear of the City Hall in 1954. The old jail was in turn immediately abandoned and sat vacant for five decades with its future in question (Figure 6). Then on October 4, 2004 the Cuba Board of Aldermen and Mayor John Koch granted permission to Boy Scout Verlin Boda to "renovate" the structure.<sup>18</sup> Between 2004 and 2006 Boda restored this structure for his Eagle Scout Project. It was reported that "doors" from the 1954 third city jail were brought to the site and Boda installed a wood stove, beds, and a desk within.<sup>19</sup> A look at the historic photograph in Figure 3 compared to the current condition however shows that the iron door at the exterior is the original door; it may have been relocated to the 1954 jail prior to returning to its original place. The building is the oldest city building extant in Cuba and stands today as a recognizable symbol of early city government.

1908 and constructed entirely of concrete block, this structure retains high integrity. Significance of this structure is under Criterion A in association with politics/government. Relative to politics/government and "institutional" buildings in Cuba, eligible buildings in this category also include religious buildings, fraternal buildings, other government buildings, and school buildings. These buildings are considered "among the most significant buildings in the community, serving as the social, political, and educational foci of the town."<sup>20</sup> The nominated building stands as the oldest government building in Cuba eligible for listing in the National Register.

The MPDF and Associated Historic Context

The Cuba City Jail was constructed during the period "Railroads and Industry, 1866-1926" and is a representative example of the "Property Type II: Institutional Architecture" as identified in the Multiple Property Documentation Form (MPDF) under which it is being listed.<sup>21</sup> Specifically built as a jail within the context of "Public-Sector Institutional Architecture" as noted in the MPDF, this structure has a flat roof with parapet and a central entrance on its primary façade indicative of these building types. This structure was also erected for the use of the local government. The larger context period was marked with a 60-acre expansion of the city in addition to the first telephone lines being installed.<sup>22</sup> Growth of commerce and residential areas also saw public improvements including the installation of sidewalks—especially those at Bond, Buchanan, Smith, Monroe, Evans, Washington, East Main, Vance and Orchard Streets.<sup>23</sup>

Demonstrative of the property type II-A: Public Sector Institutional Architecture as noted in the MPDF, this building was erected for the use of the local government as a correctional facility in association with Criterion A under politics and government.<sup>24</sup> It also represents the earliest extant government building in Cuba.<sup>25</sup> The Cuba City Jail's role within the growth of Cuba and its direct connection to the institutional history of the town are clearly representative in the building which stands today; the building is highly intact as well as original. The jail is intrinsically connected to the community's history and has a clear association with the above-mentioned historic context.<sup>26</sup>

In meeting the registration requirements of the MPDF, the nominated building is an excellent example of the property type and it retains a very high integrity of location, design, setting, materials, workmanship, feeling and association. As an individually-nominated property, the structure retains an unaltered exterior, the presence of original materials and design, roof form, retained however minimal fenestration, and a name/date stone in the parapet.<sup>27</sup> Principal interior features including the floor plan, the original jail bunks, and the interior iron cell door are extant. Minimal additions including the presence of "non-historic" interior furniture does not impact the integrity of the structure and instead helps to tell its story. The jail door evokes a sense of containment and strength and although removed from the building after abandoned in the 1950s, it was returned over five decades later to its original home.

To be listed individually in the National Register in accordance with the MPDF, the Cuba City Jail retains its original footprint and materials, its iron door and wall air vent openings, and lastly has an obvious physical character representative of its time: the building clearly reflects its period of significance from 1908 to 1954.

Endnote

It is the hope that this National Register listing will give the building the much-needed and well-deserved recognition it deserves relative to its role in understanding the history and development of Cuba government.
