Paperwork Reduction Act Statement: This information is being collected for applications to the National Register of Historic Places to nominate properties for listing or determine eligibility for listing, to list properties, and to amend existing listings. Response to this request is required to obtain a benefit in accordance with the National Historic Preservation Act, as amended (16 U.S.C. 470 et seq.). A federal agency may not conduct or sponsor, and a person is not required to respond to a collection of information unless it displays a valid OMB control number.

Estimated Burden Statement: Public reporting burden for this form is estimated to range from approximately 18 hours to 36 hours depending on several factors including, but not limited to, how much documentation may already exist on the type of property being nominated and whether the property is being nominated as part of a Multiple Property Documentation Form. In most cases, it is estimated to average 36 hours per response including the time for reviewing instructions, gathering and maintaining data, and completing and reviewing the form to meet minimum National Register documentation requirements. Direct comments regarding this burden estimate or any aspect of this form to the Chief, Administrative Services Division, National Park Service, 1849 C St., NW, Washington, DC 20240.

SUMMARY:

The Herman Dreer House, at 4335 Cote Brilliante, was the residence of Herman Dreer, a nationally-known educator, author and civil rights activist, during the most prolific period of his long career. It fits within the definition of the associated property types contained the National Register Multiple Property Document Form, "Historic and Architectural Resources of the Ville [Independent City], Missouri," under Associated Property Type No. 5, Craftsman style Residences – single and multi-family (1905-1935).

Placed on a high terraced lot, the two-story, two-family building with low-sloped roof is constructed of common bond red brick above a rubble limestone foundation. A shaped parapet vernacular building, it exhibits the influence of the Craftsman style. The building is one of a small planned development of very similar two-family buildings erected on the block in 1930, and was purchased by Dreer and his wife from the developer prior to construction. Dreer, with his family, resided in one of the units from 1930 to 1952, and his children retained ownership of it until 2000.¹

EXTERIOR FEATURES:

Highlighting the three-bay, symmetrical front facade is a variegated brick veneer laid in Flemish stretcher bond. The building is surmounted by a distinctive shaped parapet with center segmental arch and simple pinnacles, and capped by a molded terra cotta coping. A false bracketed gable that once crowned the elevation has been removed; its silhouette can be seen in shadow lines above the building's second story windows.

In the central bay, the first story displays a center tripartite window under a steel lintel with limestone lugsill. The center six-over-one sash is flanked by narrower four-over-one windows. Color-finished aluminum storm windows have been installed over the openings. In each side bay, a single leaf entry is placed under steel lintels. Both original multi-light doors have been replaced with flush wood doors. At the second story, another single leaf entry is flanked by four-over-four windows, reflecting the proportions of the openings below. A flat arch of soldier brick runs above both door and windows. The entry has been altered to install a shorter, flush wood door in place of the original multi-light door, and storms installed over the windows. At each flanking bay, a small six-light casement window, also under a flat soldier arch, has a limestone lugsill.

The front facade is dominated by a full width brick porch with battered brick columns that extend above the first story from a base of random-coursed ashlar limestone. The columns are accented and capped with limestone. The porch's entablature and corner brackets are extant but have been wrapped in aluminum. At the porch's first story, a brick railing that continues down to grade, is capped with ashlar limestone; the second story carries the original wrought-iron balustrade, with its heavy top rail, slender balusters, and central decorative circle motif. The centered concrete steps are replacements: remnants of the original pyramidal stair profile can be seen to either side. A contemporary wrought iron handrail runs down the west side of the steps.

Windows on the remainder of the building are consistently one-over-one with steel lintels and rowlock sills and their arrangement at each story is nearly identical. On the five-bay east facade, two high casement windows flank an interior chimney in the two southernmost bays. Original art glass remains in one. Paired doublehung windows occupy the center bay, while the fourth, containing the building's secondary stair hall, has a single leaf door at the first story and a single doublehung window above at the level of the stair landing. The northern bay has a single doublehung window at each story.

The west facade, with four bays, has a stair window in the southernmost, placed at the level of the main stair landing. This is the only deviation from the regular arrangement of a single doublehung window at first and second story in each bay. An exterior chimney bisects the elevation.

On the three-bay rear elevation, an entry door is centered at each story, with single doublehung windows in the flanking bays. A below-grade basement entry pierces the foundation wall on the west. A two-story frame addition on brick piers obscures over half of this facade, and is likely an open porch that was later enclosed. It has a low-sloped roof and is sheathed in vinyl horizontal lap siding. The addition has paired windows on east and west elevations; at the rear, triple doublehung windows are set at the second story, and at the first, paired windows beside a single leaf entry with short transom. The rear door is paneled and multi-light, and may be original to the building.

The Herman Dreer House, while slightly altered, retains its historic character and feeling. The building is very well maintained and retains its original use as an owner-occupied two-family structure.

Summary:

The house at 4335 Cote Brilliante Avenue is the extant building most closely associated with the professional life of Dr. Herman S. Dreer (1888-1981), a prominent St. Louis educator and a nationally-recognized author and proponent of African-American history and its dissemination. The building is significant under Criterion A in the area of ETHNIC HERITAGE-BLACK and Criterion B: EDUCATION, and is associated with Historic Context No. II: The Ville as a Center for Black Culture, 1910-1950, as defined in the Multiple Property Document Form "Historic and Architectural Resources of The Ville, St. Louis [Independent City], Missouri." The building appears to be the first that Dreer ever owned: he and his wife purchased the house in 1930 and lived there until 1952, afterwards retaining the building as an income property. Six years before Dreer's death, he conveyed it to his daughters, who held ownership until the current owners purchased it in 2000. The 22 years Dreer resided at 4335 Cote Brilliante were the most active and important of his long life. They incorporate nearly his entire teaching career in St. Louis and his efforts to promote the study and teaching of African American history. The bulk of his non-fiction writing was produced during that time.

BIOGRAPHY

Herman Dreer was born in Washington, D. C. on 12 September 1888, the grandson of slaves, and one of seven children of Thomas and Emma Dreer: Thomas was a driver for an oil company and Emma worked in a laundry. Dreer graduated from the M Street High School in Washington, where he ranked first in his class; was captain of the school's cadet corps; and won a Teacher's Scholarship Award at graduation for the highest grade on a "four-year-college" entrance exam, sponsored by Amherst

After coming to St. Louis, the Dreers lived for short periods in other buildings still extant in The Ville; however 4335 Cote Brilliante was the first purchased by Dr. Dreer and the first where the family stayed for more than a year or two.

In 1952, Dreer and his wife moved to 4903 Maffitt Place (extant) and then in 1955 purchased a house at 4435 Enright (extant). They lived in the latter property off and on throughout Dreer's later career, where he taught in Kansas and Illinois, and returned to it in 1968 when Dreer finally retired from teaching. Dreer lived there until shortly before his death in 1981. City of St. Louis Assessor's Office records, Book 1330, 60.

College. He was accepted at Bowdoin College, in Brunswick, Maine and within three years, had graduated magna cum laude and Phi Beta Kappa. 8

In 1910, Dreer began his teaching career at the Virginia Theological Seminary and College in Lynchburg, Virginia, where he taught chemistry, physics and Latin and directed the Laymen's Lyceum and the college choir. He also wrote, produced and directed plays for amateur student theatrical presentations. Writing and producing plays became a life-long avocation. While in Lynchburg, Dreer received a Master's Degree from the College, with a thesis entitled "Lyricism: Ancient, Medieval and Modern." A year after receiving his MA, Dreer was ordained a minister in the Baptist Church.

At Lynchburg, Dreer met his future wife, Mary Thomas, a student at the College. Married in 1912, Herman and Mary Thomas Dreer eventually had two daughters, Clarice and Vivian. 9

In 1914 the Dreer family moved to St. Louis, Missouri, where Dreer had accepted a position as a teacher at Sumner High School in The Ville. City directories show the family in lodgings at 4258A Cote Brilliante (extant) in 1916, and at 4268A Lucky — now Aldine (extant) in 1918. In 1920, the Dreers, their two daughters, along with Mary's sister and a lodger, were renting 2413 Goode Avenue — now Annie Malone Drive (demolished). By the time of the 1930 Census, Dreer and his family were renting

It was the college of Nathanial Hawthorne, Franklin Pierce and Oliver Otis Howard, the founder of Howard University. In 1826, John Brown Russwurm, one of the first African Americans to graduate from college, was the first Black graduate of Bowdoin. He went on to found the abolitionist newspaper, Freedom's Journal. Harriet Beecher Stowe's husband was on the faculty of the College during the years that "Uncle Tom's Cabin" was written. Stowe wrote much of the book in Appleton Hall on the College campus.

4237 Cote Brilliante for $60.00/month.¹³ Vivian Dreer remembered: "I was born on Cote Brilliante. That was the street that a lot of blacks lived who were interested in improving their lifestyles and moving upward, becoming upwardly mobile, I suppose and active in the community. And...we had a rather cohesive group of people who lived in the 4200 west block, particularly of Cote Brilliante where I lived in about 4 or 5 different houses." ¹⁴

In 1930 Dreer and his wife purchased the lot at 4335 Cote Brilliante. ¹⁵ A building permit was issued in June 1930 for the construction of a two-story, two-family house to Jerry Lloyd Investment Company, Inc., for a cost of $6,000. ¹⁶ (At the time, the Dreer family was living nearby at 4237 Cote Brilliante.) ¹⁷

Dreer had been attracted to St. Louis because of the national reputation of Sumner High School as the premier educational facility for African Americans, where many prominent African Americans chose to teach. Daughter Vivian, an outstanding educator herself, remembered:

My father brought his family here [in] 1914...to teach at Sumner High and at that time he taught several subjects. He...was supposed to be teaching English and some of the social sciences, but he [also]taught languages and he was the kind of person who never seemed to forget anything he learned....[H]e was a real scholar and they could place him in any subject area and he could handle it quite well in teaching. So he taught at Sumner for awhile and then he became the assistant principal.¹⁸

In addition to his career as an educator, Dreer also served as Assistant Pastor for several Baptist congregations, including, in 1933, Central Baptist Church (2843 Washington Avenue). His daughter Vivian remembered that her father "always wanted to be a minister." In 1950, he became pastor of Kings Way Baptist Church at 4152 Finney, serving in that capacity for nineteen years. Dreer devoted the proceeds from The Tie That Binds, his last novel, to the support of that church.

In 1942, while still at Sumner, Dreer received his second MA, this time in Sociology, from the University of Chicago. Dreer remained at Sumner until 1945, when he left to accept the position of Principal at Stowe Teachers College. 20 In 1955, at the age of 67, Dreer received a PhD. in Sociology from the University of Chicago. His dissertation was entitled, Negro Leadership in St. Louis, a Study in Race Relations.²¹

Dreer continued his teaching career at Stowe College until 1959 when he retired from the St. Louis Board of Education system—apparently unwillingly. A biographical sketch from a program of a dinner in Dreer's honor appears to express his sentiments when it says that he didn't retire, he "was retired" by the St. Louis Board of Education. 22 At any rate, this nominal retirement did not slow Dreer down. From 1960-62, he taught Sociology and Anthropology at Kansas Wesleyan University; English at Illinois College in Jacksonville, Illinois in 1963; and at MacMurray College, also in Jacksonville, in 1964. He ended his peripatetic university career at Kansas Wesleyan University in 1968 at the age of 80, returning to St. Louis where he spent the next eight years working to promote African American history through a popular newspaper column.

In 1966, in recognition of his public service and accomplishments, City of St. Louis Mayor A. J. Cervantes appointed Dreer to the prestigious City of St. Louis Landmarks Commission, its first African American member. He served on that board for two years. 23 Three years later, Dr. Dreer was honored by citizens of St. Louis with a testimonial dinner at the Gateway Hotel. 24 The program of the dinner shows Mayor A.J. Cervantes, Rev. William Collins, Pastor of Antioch Baptist Church, and Rev. Conn, Pastor of the First Baptist Church as guests. In the program Dreer is described:

Dr. Vivian Dreer, U. of Missouri-St. Louis Oral History Interview. Stowe Teachers College began as Sumner Normal, a segregated training program established in 1890 by the St. Louis Public Schools to provide teachers for black elementary schools; originally it was an extension of Sumner High School. In 1924, when it became a four-year program, its name was changed to Sumner Teachers College, and four years later, renamed Stowe Teachers College in honor of Harriet Beecher Stowe. The school merged in 1954 with Harris Teachers College (a white institution) and is now Harris-Stowe State College. Dreer interviewed both Black and white St. Louisans to determine which well-known Black leaders were perceived to be the most influential. He then compiled a questionnaire for over fifty Black community leaders. From the answers, he was able to construct a model of effective Black leadership.

To St. Louis Dr. Dreer has brought a distinct way of life, which highlights the preservation of the family, Christian living, and the high place of Negro History in the growth and progress of America. His lofty ideals, his Christian spirit, and his humanitarian philosophy provide fulfillment not only for those near and dear to him, but to all citizens of the great society.

Herman Dreer died in St. Louis in 1981 at the age of 92. ²⁵ After his death, several scholarships were created in his honor, including the Herman S. Dreer Scholarship and Leadership Award. ²⁶

EDUCATION

When Herman Dreer came to teach at Sumner High School (NR-listed 19 April 1988) in St. Louis in 1914, Sumner was the premier high school for African American students in the country. It soon became clear to Dreer that there was a serious omission in its curricula: no effort was being made to include the study of achievements of African Americans and the history of the race. Dreer was to make this his preeminent concern throughout his teaching career. He began to promote the study of African American history in several innovative ways. First, he went back to his love of theatre and began to write and produce plays for student theatrical productions on little-known African Americans and historical events. In 1932, for example, he produced "Sunrise", a dramatization of the life of Madison Washington, who led a famous rebellion aboard the slave ship Creole in 1841. He wrote at least two full length, and six one act plays every year on similar subjects for Sumner students to perform. Through the plays, his students—and their audiences—gained knowledge of black achievement and pride in their heritage.

Dreer was a friend of author, publisher and historian Dr. Carter Woodson, ²⁹ the initiator of Negro History Week, and was instrumental in bringing Woodson to St. Louis for speaking engagements. ³⁰ He assisted Woodson in the research and compilation for Woodson's ground-breaking work, The Negro in Our History, ³¹ the first history of Blacks in America. Dreer, with educator Julia Davis, founded the local chapter of the National Association for the Study of Afro-American Life and History (NASALH), a national organization founded by Woodson. Dreer became the first president of the chapter. ³² In an effort to disseminate the work of Woodson and other African American writers, Dreer started Pushkin Publishing Company. While it attracted a few investors, the venture ultimately failed, to Dreer's financial loss. ³³

His relationship with Woodson augmented Dreer's passion for Black history: he made African American history part of every course he taught, and in 1934, created the Carter Woodson School of Negro History. Housed in the Poro College building (demolished) in the heart of The Ville neighborhood, history classes were held on Saturday and children and adults attended. Dreer also established a "Saturday School" at Poro to assist teachers in integrating African American studies to their class curriculum. Dreer wrote: "The trouble is this. Too much of our training has come from the experiences of white people; too little has come from the experiences of the Negro."

In 1934, Dreer, intending to pursue a second Master's Degree, applied to St. Louis University³⁶ which never responded. He also applied to Washington University, considered a bastion of liberal principles and thought, and co-founded by abolitionist William Greenleaf Eliot.³⁷ The University had accepted a few African American students. Years later, Dreer wrote about the experience in one of his Negro ³⁶ St. Louis University was founded in 1818 as the St. Louis College by Reverend Louis William Du Bourg, the newly appointed Catholic Bishop of Louisiana; in 1826 he requested that the Society of Jesus (the Jesuits) to assume control of the struggling St. Louis College. The University has been a Jesuit Institution ever since. "St. Louis University" http://www.slu.edu/academics.html (accessed 22 September 2008).

Washington University was co-founded in 1853 as a nonsectarian, private institution by St. Louis leader Wayman Crow and Unitarian minister William Greenleaf Eliot, (grandfather of poet T. S. Eliot). Crow, who had introduced the charter creating the school, named it Eliot Seminary; Eliot, however, was against the name and in 1854, the Board of Trustees changed it to "Washington Institute in St. Louis" because its charter, by coincidence was passed on Washington's birthday and because the name Washington was free from any political partisanship. It became Washington University in 1857. The institution had the reputation of being a liberal, free-thinking community. history columns for the St. Louis Argus. As a member of Phi Beta Kappa, he had for years received invitations to ceremonies and receptions for Phi Beta Kappa members at Washington University. Whenever he attended, he noticed he was always the only person of color present. Upon his application, the registrar of Washington University sent Dreer a letter that said although he was qualified to be accepted, the University could not admit him because the University of Missouri would not accept Negroes, and Washington University was following the State University's policy. (Dreer also notes that after his application was received, he was never again invited to a Phi Beta Kappa event.) ³⁸

This brusque refusal by both the State and local private universities to admit black students, no matter how qualified, inspired Dreer to organize and help fund the re-opening of Douglass College for African Americans. Douglass had been founded in The Ville in 1926 by Benjamin Bowles, the retired principal of Lincoln High School in East St. Louis, Illinois. The original school had been granted a charter from the State of Missouri, but had closed after a few years because of the declining health of its founder. Dreer, by then Assistant Principal at Sumner, had solicited his fellow teachers to staff a private summer school for high school students, because the St. Louis School Board, due to limited funds, had closed theirs. The school was financially rewarding, and Dreer hoped that its fees could help fund a full-time school of higher education for Black students. At the time, an African American student hoping for a college degree had to leave the area; the only institution open to them in the State was Lincoln University, in Jefferson City. Description of the control of the state was Lincoln University, in Jefferson City.

Dreer re-opened Douglass College in 1934. He recruited trustees from local businessmen, professionals, and teachers and held the first classes at the school in a rented building located at 4300 West Belle Avenue (demolished). The College offered degrees in Liberal Arts, Religion and Business Administration. Dreer was elected President of the College by the Board of Trustees and served in that position throughout the life of the school. Dreer and other trustees not only ran the school, they taught many of the classes and provided financial support when funding ran out. The school eventually purchased a building at 3628 Finny Avenue.⁴³

The school operated from 1934 through 1942 and lost money every year, despite contributions from its trustees and the refusal of its teachers to accept a salary. Tuition fees were kept low to allow more students to attend. Dreer, who had had to give up private teaching for the College, put more than $12,000.00 of his own money into the school, though at the time he made less than $6,000.00 a year at Sumner. Dreer would plead for donations at local churches on Sunday mornings to keep the school going. In the end, however, the College could not support itself. In 1942, Dreer was refused personal life insurance because of a medical examination that said he had high blood pressure and would be dead in ten years. As a result, he resigned the presidency of Douglass because he thought he could not risk his family's financial security for the liability of running the College. It closed within the year.

While the failure of Douglass was difficult for Dreer, he continued to pursue his goal of higher education for African American St. Louisans. Many of the Douglass teachers had come from Sumner; but Dreer had also been able to recruit white college professors and local religious leaders, including the Dean of Washington University's College of Liberal Arts; the pastor of St. Elizabeth's Catholic Church; an influential local rabbi and the Bishop of the Missouri Diocese of the Episcopal Church. Dreer worked with these leaders and the Douglass trustees to influence local politicians. Using a position paper Dreer wrote containing an analysis of the impact of the lack of higher education on Blacks in Missouri, these prominent local citizens approached the St. Louis School Board, and in 1940, Stowe Teachers College for African Americans opened in The Ville. Two years later, St. Louis University changed its admission policy and began to accept African Americans.

Dreer was able to enlist the assistance of the St. Louis branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored Persons, which filed a suit amicus curiae ("as a Friend of the Court") that contended because the University received public funding, Black citizens were forced to support the educations of non-resident and foreign students but were unable to benefit from the investment of their tax dollars. The suit asked that Washington University pay $687,000 to the City in taxes or agree to admit African Americans. The University began once again to admit Black students in 1948.

CIVIL RIGHTS ACTIVITY

A major problem for middle class and upwardly mobile African Americans in the years between the World Wars in St. Louis grew out of the increasing residential segregation of the City. The prejudice they faced in housing was augmented by an inability to obtain financing for the purchase of property. Segregated Black areas did not appraise well in the eyes of banks controlled by whites; and Black citizens looking to invest in a house were increasingly limited by the use of restrictive racial covenants to selected, generally less desirable, areas of the City. While flats and tenement apartments were available in the Mill Creek Valley and other crowded, segregated areas, few places outside of The Ville offered a chance for new homeowners. The New Age Federal Savings and Loan Association was founded in 1915 by a group of black community leaders to provide loans to black St. Louisans to build or purchase homes at a time when St. Louis banks and financial institutions consistently refused to make loans to minority individuals. The association is still in existence today and has played a major role in extending credit to individuals, organizations, businesses and churches in St. Louis. 47 Dreer was an early investor⁴⁸ and decided that, as The Ville was becoming increasingly the destination of choice for middle class Black citizens in the City, it was crucial to provide appropriate and accessible financing for these new residents. In 1926, Dreer, with seven other prominent residents of The Ville, formed the Elleardsville Financial Corporation. 49 The Corporation was begun with the personal funds of the eight partners, $15,000.00 in total, and it was created to fill the need for financing home purchases and new construction. The headquarters of the new lending institution was in a storefront office at 4214 W. Easton Avenue — now Dr. Martin Luther King Drive (demolished). 50

Dreer was also the motivating force behind the creation of Peoples Finance Corporation of St. Louis, an industrial bank was founded in 1923 in an effort to provide loans to working class people who were ordinarily overlooked by even those banks serving the African American population. Dreer wrote: "Though we [African Americans] have been creative in music and literature and art, we have been imitative in business. Though the wages of our people have been meager, many of our business men have too often disregarded our small incomes and have taken all the traffic would bear especially as to the retail and sale of real estate." ⁵¹

The Peoples Finance Corporation became nationally-known for its service to minority groups, and in 1929 was the leader in African-American lending, with more than a half million dollars in resources, and gave rise to similar institutions in St. Louis, Cleveland, Detroit, Kansas City, Newark and others. Like many small banks, the Peoples Finance Corporation failed during the Depression, taking a good deal of Dreer's money with it. Alouis, Cleveland, Detroit, Kansas City, Newark and others.

Extensive use of restrictive racial covenants—where owners in certain areas agreed not to sell their property to people of other races—had contributed to widespread residential segregation in St. Louis. In 1944, a house at 4600 Labadie Avenue, now known as the Shelley House [NR-listed 4/18/88; NHL 12/19/90] was sold to an African American couple despite such a covenant. ⁵⁵ A neighbor, Louis Kraemer sued in St. Louis Circuit Court to enforce the covenant contract. James T. Bush, Sr., the real estate broker who sold the house to the Shelleys, assumed responsibility for financing the defense, forming the Real Estate Brokers Association of St. Louis to support the Shelleys.

At Bush's request, Herman Dreer organized a citizen's group to assist with the legal battle. Dreer became Chairman of the Citizen's Committee – Shelley Restrictive Covenant Case throughout 1947 and 1948 and worked tirelessly in researching case law and in fundraising. ⁵⁶

The case was ultimately decided by the U.S. Supreme Court, where in 1948, in a vote of six to zero, the Court ruled that courts cannot uphold contracts that are in violation of the 14th Amendment, which ensures equal protection under the law. The decision made such covenants unenforceable and was a major victory in the battle for equal protection for African Americans, not only in St. Louis, but across the nation.

In 1948, McMillan Publishing Company contacted Dreer and requested that he compile and edit an anthology of African American writings. ⁶³ In 1950, American Literature by Negro Authors was published by McMillan. In the introduction, Dreer points out slaves brought to this country spoke hundreds of dialects, and so were at first unable to communicate with one another; and that it was illegal for slaves to be taught to read and write. Despite these impediments, in 1760—within 141 years of arrival of the first slaves at Jamestown—Jupiter Jones, a slave, was writing and publishing poetry in English; and by 1790, poet Phyllis Wheatley, a former slave, was in publication. ⁶⁴

In 1950, Dreer wrote and edited the first publication of the Metropolitan St. Louis Negro Dictionary, a collection of biographies of prominent African American leaders. In his own entry, Dreer proudly displays a full-page photograph of his home at 4335 Cote Brilliante Avenue (See Photo #9) and summed up his philosophy of life: "He is a firm believer in Negro genius, Negro culture, the equality of races, and in Christianity." ⁶⁵
