Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

Located on St. Louis' near north side, the Murphy-Blair District is a nineteenth century, German immigrant neighborhood comprising approximately six hundred contributing buildings of which over ninety percent are residential. By 1875, all but the northern edge of the District was densely built up (Photos #1 & 2) and at the turn of the century, most of the remaining lots were filled. The majority of houses are attached, two-story, two- or three-bay, multi-family units constructed of red brick -- the city's principal building material. Although construction dates span about seventy years (circa 1855-1925), the houses reflect slow-to-change conservative building traditions in which plan, massing and facade composition remain constant and stylistic differences are usually confined to roof forms and variations in ornament. Usually without set back, the houses are unified by their size, scale, simply articulated planar facades, continuous cornice lines, materials and color. A commercial strip extends along North 14th Street and numerous corner buildings throughout the District combine first-story storefronts with residential use above. Several four- or five-story, red brick industrial buildings dating from the 1890s to the early twentieth century relate to the residential fabric through scale, materials and detailing. Institutional buildings include three churches, two parochial and two public schools, a German military hall and a public bath house. The majority of houses are still in residential use. Three churches are active; Webster School is open and two of the large manufacturing buildings are in non-industrial use. The bath house is closed.

The District's street plan follows grids laid out at the time the original subdivisions were platted between 1846 and 1857; portions of original brick streets and sidewalks exist. Two public circles located at the eastern edge of the District are unique features surviving from the town of North St. Louis which opened in 1816; the third of the original circles now conforms to the street grid. (Figure #1 and Architectural Survey Maps.) All three areas retain the institutional or recreational use for which they were originally reserved. Once a brickyard, Strodman Park at the District's northeast boundary was dedicated for public use in 1924.

The majority of buildings are in good condition. Typical of other nineteenth century, inner-city neighborhoods, the most common problems in Murphy-Blair are deteriorated wood features such as cornices, dormers, rear porches and stairs and slate roofs. Although no large scale rehabilitation has occurred and abandoned and boarded buildings (Photos #8 & 16) are scattered throughout, much of the neighborhood has been well maintained. The most frequently encountered alterations are first-story storefronts as illustrated in Photos #14, 27, 28, 33, 36 and 37. As a result of arson, abandonment and Urban Renewal policies, structural density has dropped over the past two decades -- particularly at the southern edge where new, low-rise housing has recently been completed just outside the District boundary. (Photo #3) However, the District still retains a large proportion of strong, cohesive streetscapes in all areas and the blocks with lower structural density survive with contributing buildings which architecturally and historically are integrally related to the whole.

Designations of all non-contributing buildings are indicated by asterisks on the Architectural Survey Maps; non-contributing buildings include those which are less than fifty years old, marginal one-story sheds and garages, sheet metal quonset huts and a couple of houses covered with aluminum siding. Photos #4, 5 and 44-seventh from left.

All contributing buildings are color coded on the Architectural Survey Maps under eight classifications (frequently overlapping) based on style (Urban Vernacular Classicism, Italianate and Mansard); type or use (Early Twentieth Century Flat, Commercial and Industrial); material (Frame) and a Miscellaneous group which includes both residential and institutional buildings. Streetscapes usually include more than one style or type of structure.

Urban Vernacular Classicism, circa 1855-mid-1870s (coded red)

These buildings represent the largest group in the District and include the earliest houses. (This classification also includes a few, one-story backyard smoke-houses.) Constructed of red brick with dormered gabled roofs, the houses vary from one to three stories, two to six bays wide and are sometimes detached but are most frequently found in rows. The most common example rises two stories from a stone foundation and is three bays wide. Windows are headed with brick segmental arches or flat stone lintels; a few employ jack arches. Sills are wood or stone and occasionally brick. Cornices usually exhibit simple, brick dentiling, although a few feature wood modillions. (Wood cornices are coded on the maps with a w symbol.) Original wood roof shingles have all been replaced with rolled sheathing. Almost all buildings appear to have been built for multi-family occupancy with access to upper-story units gained by rear, wood exterior stairs. Frequently, contiguous houses introduce streetfront entrances to passageways which tunnel through the building giving access to rear stairs. (The passageways are coded on the maps with an "0.") A few houses survive with cast iron balconies. Photographs 6 through 14 illustrate clusters of representative houses; additional examples may be found in streetscapes illustrated in Photos #15, 17, 19, 21, 24, 30, 44, 48, 50 and 52.

Italianate, 1867-1880 (coded green)

Two stories high and two to four bays wide, Italianate buildings are distinguished from Vernacular Classicism chiefly by a bolder, more elaborate cornice treatment (with projecting wood brackets or corbeled brick), the use of round or segmentally arched windows and doors and higher stone foundations requiring front door steps. An unusually fine example at 1214 North Market Street (Photo #15-third from left) features a stone facade with first-story, round-arched windows and door, segmentally arched second-story windows and a bracketed wood cornice. Many examples employ curved stone lintels and corbeled brick cornices laid to imitate wood brackets; two houses feature ornamental cast iron lintels -- once commonly found on middle-class houses but now scarce city wide (Photo #13-second from left). An interesting, large commercial/residential complex on the southeast corner of Blair and North Market Streets features first-story, ornamental cast iron columns and decorative paneled brickwork on the facade in addition to the usual Italianate features. Typical examples of the Italianate house may be seen in Photos #11, 14 through 19, 22, 23, 25, 29-right, 30, 34, 35-left foreground, 40 and 42.

Mansard, 1875-1910 (coded purple)

The popularity and longevity of the mansard roof in St. Louis is well illustrated in the Murphy-Blair District. Almost every block has at least one mansard, representing either an addition to an existing house or construction with a new house. (Mansard additions are coded with the symbol 'M' on the map and are illustrated in Photos #14, 50 and 52). Gray slate is the most common roof material, although several are enriched with polychrome patterns. With the exception of one, three-story and a few, one-story houses, the remaining examples all are two stories high. Many of the mansarded buildings share general Italianate characteristics such as bracketed wood or corbeled brick cornices, segmentally arched openings, raised stone foundations and planar facade compositions -- the latter also typical of Vernacular Classicism. Upper-story flats are reached by rear, wood exterior stairs. Toward the end of the century, mansarded houses appear with Late Victorian features such as, polychromed, richer detailing and a few employ interior stairs. Representative examples may be seen in Photos #4, 7, 11, 13, 17, 18, 20 through 32, 34, 36 and 40 through 43.

Frame, 1876-1890 (coded yellow)

Although the District's twenty-five frame houses represent a small percentage of the total structures, they are significant examples of a simple vernacular building tradition of which little remains in the city. According to the 1857 City Census, one-story frame houses were as numerous as brick suggesting that the early presence of small lumber yards within the District and the large lumber businesses to the east made frame construction a readily available and inexpensive alternative to brick. When Hopkin's Atlas of St. Louis was published in 1883, frame houses were scattered throughout the District but the largest concentration was located in City Blocks at the northern edge where the greatest number of surviving frame buildings stand today. The late-1870s, one- and two-story frame houses illustrated in Photo #31 are representative of others in the District. The row includes a two-story, flat roofed house with an Italianate cornice and a mansarded one-story one in addition to five, gabled-roof houses. While all are sheathed with asphalt shingles, the simple framing of the fenestration and doorways is exposed.

Early Twentieth Century Flats, 1905-1925 (coded blue)

With the exception of a one-story, gray brick, two-family building at 1217 North Market Street, the remaining flats are all two-story red brick and have flat roofs. A few, like the 1905, six-family flat at 1441-45 Clinton, display round-arched openings outlined with ornamental brick moldings, but the majority employ rectangular openings. In contrast to typical multi-family houses of an earlier period, all flats in the District have interior stairs. Typical of Murphy-Blair is a row of three, four-family buildings at 3101-11 Palm constructed in 1907 for furniture manufacturer Clemens Eckhoff and designed by Gerhard Becker. (Photo #32) Each of the two entrances has angled doors providing a separate front entrance for each tenant. The corbeled brick and terra cotta cornice/parapet is also commonly found on other flats

(Photo #34-foreground). (Galvanized iron or copper is occasionally substituted for terra cotta.) More elaborate parapet and window trim were employed for the flat built in 1908 for Fred Weitkamp by contractors W. H. Dicke & Bro. at 1946-50 Palm. The building also features light brown face brick at the basement level and red brick above -- frequently seen on St. Louis flats of this period (Photo #22-right). The corner store and flat extending thirteen bays along Branch Street is the largest of the District's flats (Photo #33). It was designed by second generation Irish architect William P. McMahon, a prolific designer of middle- and working-class housing throughout the city in the early twentieth century. Seven buildings constructed in 1925 at 2116-22 Branch and 3316-24 Florissant are the last group of flats in the District. Designed by architect Oliver Popp for the Glick Realty Company, they employ the textured, vitreous brick in various tones of dark red (laid in contrasting mortar) which was popular in St. Louis beginning in the teens. Each building has a porch with brick piers centered on the facade and an open porch above for second-story tenants. Roof lines are varied with red-tiled pseudo-mansards and gables interspersed with simple parapets.

Commercial, 1881-1930 (coded brown)

The largest number of commercial buildings is concentrated between Benton Street and St. Louis Avenue along North 14th Street, well established as the neighborhood's principal business strip by the turn of the century. Most likely all of the two- and three-story red or buff brick, 1880s and 1890s buildings there were constructed for combination first-story commercial and upper-story residential use. They exhibit the same planar facades and fenestration as contemporary houses and feature similar historical forms and detailing such as mansard roofs and Italianate cornices. (Photos #35 & 36) Apparently, the first building constructed solely for commercial use was the richly embellished, two-story Korte Building designed in 1906 by architects Widmann & Walsh (Photo #36-right foreground). During the teens and twenties, several older buildings were updated with new facades (Photos #35 & 37-left). New buildings constructed included 2707-09 North 14th Street featuring wide-arched second story display windows (Photo #35-third from left) and 3516 North 14th Street, a 1929, one-story building displaying terra cotta Gothic detailing (Photo #37-center). Throughout the District are numerous corner buildings of various styles and periods which were built or altered for first-story commercial occupancy. They have been coded on the Architectural Survey Map with a brown bar at the street line to indicate partial commercial use. Most are installed with cast iron storefronts sometimes extending across one or more facades or only framing the corner. Typical examples may be seen in Photos #11, 16, 17, 24, 27, 28 and 33.

Industrial Buildings, circa 1870-circa 1920 (coded gray)

The major manufacturing buildings remaining in Murphy-Blair (two shoe factories, two furniture factories and a spaghetti factory) are characteristic of St. Louis industrial construction of their 1891 to 1909 building period. Four and five stories high and of "slow burning," wood post and lintel interior construction they are, like the District's residential architecture, red brick above limestone foundations. All but the 1901 addition to the Peters Shoe Company factory have segmentally arched window openings. Noteworthy for their unadorned, utilitarian design and the regular rhythm of their fenestration are the circa 1895 Ramelose Shoe factory at 2301 North 11th Street and the two furniture factories (1891-1909) where the only enrichment appears in the simple corbeled brick cornices. The more prepossessing Peters Shoe complex of 1891-1901 represents a conscious attempt to impart image through design and detailing; the gabled and pavilioned Maull spaghetti factory (1903-07) is also a more sophisticated example of industrial design.

The other industrial buildings in the District include two remnants of large complexes: a one-story, circa 1902 brewery building and a cooperage warehouse of about 1910. A small furniture factory/residence (circa 1870) at 2109-13 North 14th Street is a vestige of the once numerous small manufacturing operations which were woven into the residential fabric of the District. The three-story St. Louis Shoe Last Company building is a teen's update of a plant established in the District by 1897. In the utilitarian tradition of the 1890s factories, the building features expansive triple windows below broad arches and brick color and texture reflecting the later building period (Photo #51-right background). The major plants of the District have undergone few changes to their major facades, although most have new non-contributing portions at rear elevations.

The Eckhoff (later Valley) Furniture Company Factory at the southeast corner of Branch and 21st Streets was constructed in 1893 and 1895 installments (Photo #38). The L-shaped building of five stories extends approximately 100 feet by 50 feet deep along Branch and 90 feet by 33 feet along 21st Street. The ten bays of openings with wood insets above paired, six over six windows are now boarded. Sills are brick. Later additions to the building include a one-story drying kiln at the rear for treating lumber and a 1925, two-story addition extending 70 feet along 21st Street. Window openings are rectangular with soldier courses of brick above the windows.

The Meier and Pohlmann Furniture Factory (1891-1901) is similar in detail. The earliest two, four-story portions of the complex (seven bays on Palm Street and six on 14th Street, with six additional bays joined to the south on 14th Street) have wood sills. Stone sills were used for the later additions which include eight bays on Palm with a round-arched entrance connected by a one-story bridge to a similar block of eight bays to the west. (The latter was apparently originally three stories, as a brickwork cornice appears above the third as well as the fourth story.) (Not illustrated.)

The Peters Shoe Company is the most imposing of Murphy-Blair's factories. A four-story building begun in 1891 with seven, wood silled bays punctuated by brick pilasters on North Market in Jackson Place (Circle #2) was followed by adjoining additions to the west of four pilastered bays, a curved stair tower with stone-trimmed parapet and three more bays angled to accommodate the curved site (Photo #39).

(A loading dock on North Market Street has been added to this part of the complex.) The 1901 addition to the west included five more bays on North Market, a stair tower angled to face the intersection of North Market and Hadley Streets and nineteen bays along Hadley. The upper windows of this stair tower are round headed with brick arches enriched by brick keystones and terra cotta ornament. Terra cotta egg and dart bead molding appears below the stone sills of the windows of the stair tower. Other enrichment consists of stone sill courses employed at the second and fourth stories and brickwork straps at the cornice.

Maul's Spaghetti Factory, built in 1903 and 1907 increments of two stories each, extends twelve bays on St. Louis Avenue and twelve along North 13th (Photo #40). An arched entrance with multi-paned transom is centered on the St. Louis Avenue elevation. Each of the gables on the St. Louis Avenue elevation has a blind oculus. Hipped roof, attic dormers are employed on each elevation. (Alterations included the bricking in of fourth-story bays on the west elevation, the encasing of all wood sills with sheet metal and a one-story, roofed loading dock at the east elevation.)

Miscellaneous

A. Residential

A small group of turn-of-the-century red brick houses (mostly single family) depart from conventional neighborhood designs through introduction of somewhat irregular massing, new window shapes, roof forms, projecting front porches, Colonial Revival detailing and other atypical features. Examples may be seen in the following photographs: #18-third from left; #26-far right; #41-foreground; #42-far left; #43-left; #44-left foreground. A few private garages have also been designated as contributing buildings because of the quality of their brickwork or ornamental detailing.

B. Institutional

Institutional buildings illustrate a variety of styles generally not found elsewhere in the District.

Ames Kindergarten, 1892 (Photo #45) Rising two stories above a limestone foundation, the school is constructed of red brick. Tudor-arched, double-hung sash windows are employed on all elevations. The front facade features bands of black and white glazed brick in the arches and ornamental terra cotta insets in the cornice. A corbeled brick cornice wraps around the side and rear elevations. A polygonal, two-story bay projects from the east elevation.

Deutsche Militaer Halle, 1892 (Photo #46) Designed by German-born St. Louis architect Henry E. Peipers, the two- and three-story building features a terra cotta tympanum with German military emblems above the front doorway and paneled brick piers on the front (south) elevation and on the ten-bay west elevation. At the second story, the center three bays of the west elevation are marked with semi-circular relieving arches above paired rectangular windows; segmentally arched windows are employed on the end bays. The three-story, seven-bay north (rear) elevation features plain piers rising from the street level to a simple corbeled brick cornice. Molded brick stringcourses divide the second and third stories. Garage doors are installed on the west end of the front elevation where part of the building is presently in use as a machine shop. Dark brown paint covers portions of the red brick building.

Webster School, 1906 (Photos #47 & 48) Designed by nationally recognized school architect William B. Ittner, Webster School rises four stories and is enhanced by the use of imperfect brick in various shades of red. (See Section 8.) Two stair towers with first-story entrances are crowned with open arcading repeated in stucco and blind arches at the fourth story of the front elevation and in a new non-contributing addition below. Although no historical photograph could be found, the building appears to be little altered with the exception of the front addition and tuckpointing of a different color on the upper portion of the corner sections.

Grace Hill Episcopal Church, 1923 (Photos #5 & 49) Constructed of rock-faced limestone, the simply articulated Gothic Revival church features an impressive crenellated crossing tower. Small lancet windows with uncolored leaded glazing appear between buttresses in the nave, in the transept, the apse and on the primary facade. An exposed timbered ceiling is employed on the interior of the church. The nave is now installed with low office partitioning but the crossing and apse have been reserved as a memorial chapel. The church was designed by the architectural firm Jamieson & Pearl.

Grace Hill Settlement Hall and Dispensary, circa 1905-10 (Photo #49-right) Building permits indicate that this building was constructed in two stages: the first story in 1905 and the second in 1910. Segmentally arched windows are employed on all elevations; original red brick has been painted white. The building has been variously used by Grace Hill as a Sunday School, Hall and Dispensary.

Fourth Baptist Church, 1923 (Photo #50-far left) Constructed of dark red brick, the church rises three stories. The primary facade is marked by terra cotta pilasters and a large pediment; second- and third-story windows feature opaque leaded glass. The south (side) elevation is articulated with five bays of paired rectangular windows.

St. Michael's School, 1923 (Photo #52-left) Originally constructed as a school for St. Michael's Irish Catholic parish (and later used as the parish church), the building is now occupied by a Baptist church. It was designed by St. Louis architects O'Meara & Hills. Constructed of variegated shades of buff brick above a limestone foundation, the building features a gabled facade enriched with brick diapering, limestone accents at the gable corners and a two-story projecting bay. The south (side) elevation extends seven bays along Benton Street and is articulated with rectangular, double-hung windows.

Public Bath House #6, 1937 (Photo #53) The last bath house constructed in the city and the only one now remaining on the north side, this building incorporates the foundations and some walls of a late 1870s fire station. Designed by Building Commissioner Albert Osburg, the gray brick facade of the one-story building is embellished with light gray terra cotta pilasters, frieze and door enframements fashioned with Art Deco motifs. It has been closed since the late 1950s.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

The Murphy-Blair District is eligible for listing in the National Register of Historic Places under Criteria A and C, and is significant in the following categories:

ARCHITECTURE: Over ninety percent residential, the Murphy-Blair District contains good representative concentrations of the major types and styles of working-class housing built in St. Louis from circa 1855 to 1925. The buildings are distinguished by the quality of their materials, workmanship and vernacular design. The majority of houses are two-story red brick rows exhibiting features characteristic of Urban Vernacular Classicism, Italianate and Mansard traditions; a group of early twentieth century flats employ planar facades, fenestration and cornice treatment similar to a simple vernacular building tradition of which little remains in the city. Several four- to five-story industrial buildings constructed between 1891 and 1909 are characteristic of turn-of-the-century St. Louis industrial design. Their fenestration, simple cornice treatment and red brick facades relate them to the residential fabric. Institutional buildings range from the Vernacular Classicism of Zion Lutheran Church (1860) to the 1937 Art Deco facade of Public Bath House #6. The buildings represent both High Art and vernacular institutional imagery typical of their building period as well as the socio-economic conditions of the District.

ETHNIC HERITAGE: The District developed as one of St. Louis' earliest and densest concentrations of working-class German immigrants. The city's largest nineteenth century ethnic group, Germans contributed significantly to St. Louis growth in population and diversification in industry. Murphy-Blair's skilled and unskilled German laborers contributed to the city's emerging industrial strength through employment at leading industries both within the District and to the east of it. Zion Lutheran Church and the Deutsche Militaer Halle are among St. Louis' small number of surviving buildings associated with German institutional history.

INDUSTRY: Several turn-of-the-century factories in the District were constructed by major local industries which helped propel St. Louis into position as the nation's fourth leading industrial city by the turn of the century. The factories were a major source of employment for neighborhood ethnic groups.

SOCIAL/HUMANITARIAN: For over seventy years, Grace Hill Settlement House (sponsored by the Episcopal Diocese of Missouri) has offered social services to the Murphy-Blair neighborhood; three District buildings are associated with their on-going work. Public Bath House #6, the last constructed in the city's efforts to improve sanitation in congested inner-city neighborhoods, is the only surviving bath house on the north side.

District boundaries were determined on the west by Florissant Avenue, an eight-lane busy commercial thoroughfare (Photos #4 & 30); on the east by Interstate 70 (Photo #47); on the north by the adjacent Hyde Park Certified Local District; and on the south by new, low-rise housing (Photo #3) and two National Register Districts.

(Architectural Survey Map--Murphy-Blair South.) The boundaries also coincide with early subdivisions (Figure #1). The SS. Cyril & Methodius and Mullanphy National Register Districts to the south and the Hyde Park Certified Local District share historical development patterns and similar housing stock with the Murphy-Blair District.

The eastern edge of the Murphy-Blair District was once part of the town of North St. Louis, the first platted community north of St. Louis (Figure #1). Laid out in 1816 by landowners Colonel William Chambers, Major William Christy and Major Thomas Wright, the 374-arpent tract was bounded on the north and south by Montgomery and Madison Streets and extended eastward from 12th (now Hadley) Street to the Mississippi River. Three circular areas, each three hundred feet in diameter, were set aside for public use at the western boundary: Circle #1 (Clinton Place), "The circle on the mound overlooking the town is set apart for a Seminary of Learning"; Circle #2 (Jackson Place) was reserved for a park and gathering place; Circle #3 (Marion Place) was the site for a church with "burying ground open to all denominations of religious persons." (Evidence that Indian mounds existed at two of the three circles is substantial and would suggest that the founders were at least partly inspired by pre-existing topographical features.) A thirteen-acre strip of land along the river at the foot of North Market Street (Exchange Square) was reserved as a public wharf with promenade or commons. (Figure #1)

William Christy, a surveyor and gentleman farmer, was one of a group of prominent Kentuckians who settled or owned land on the city's north side and assumed leading roles in local government and commerce during the Territorial days and afterwards. Intermarriage and issue from these Kentucky families subsequently resulted in the opening of several subdivisions immediately west of the original town of North St. Louis. Thomas Wright, husband of Christy's daughter Mary Ann, owned land adjoining the western boundary of North St. Louis. Between 1848 and 1857, Wright's heirs (Orleana Schaumburg, William F. H. Wright, Martha A. Wills, Thomas Wright and Mary F. Glasgow) subdivided his estate (Figure #1). Landholders in three other Additions within the nominated District boundaries were also members of the native Bluegrass clan: Mary Tyler (daughter of William Chambers); John O'Fallon (a platter of the East Union Addition); and Ann C. T. Farrar, O'Fallon's half-sister and widow of Dr. Bernard G. Farrar whose first wife, Sarah, was William Christy's daughter (Figure #1). Christy, Wright and Chambers all built houses on their property (demolished). (The Widow Hebert Tract Addition (Figure #1) was still owned in 1846 by descendents of an eighteenth century French landowner.)

The opening of these Additions coincided with St. Louis' boom in German immigration and dramatic surge in population which raised the city's national rank in total population from 44th position in 1830 to sixth place in 1850. With nearly one-third of St. Louis German-born by 1860, the city was second only to New York City in numbers of Germans. In 1850, Ward 6 (which included the Murphy-Blair District) was nearly one-third German-born -- the second highest density of Germans in the city. The platting in 1844 of the Town of Bremen by two German landowners was another indicator of German settlement in this general north side area; in 1850, Bremen's boundaries were extended substantially southwestwardly, absorbing a large portion of the nominated District (Figure #1). By the mid-1850s, greater Bremen was reported to be a thriving community of three thousand persons with a total of twenty-nine different manufacturing establishments employing 1,150 workers. Prominent industries concentrated along the riverfront included several sawmills, pork houses, a rolling mill, rosin oil manufactory and a cooperage.¹ West of the river at the northeastern edge of the District was Davis & Company's flour mills and ice houses, illustrated at #4 in Compton & Dry's Pictorial St. Louis-1875 (Photo #2). Good deposits of clay and stone resulted in the appearance of numerous small brickyards and several quarries throughout the Bremen/North St. Louis area, some of which later were developed as residential sites.

The 1857 City Census and deed research in City Blocks within the District confirm the strong presence of the Germans -- a dominance which would continue well into the twentieth century. A few Irish workers were living in the less populous northern part of the District but Ward figures indicate that Germans outnumbered Irish seven to one in 1858; the city-wide ratio of Germans to Irish remained two to one throughout the nineteenth century. An occasional Anglo-American family, three "free-colored" families and a colony of French Icarians were also living in the District in 1857.²

By 1860, the District's population had grown sufficiently to justify the construction of the area's first public school, six Protestant churches (all within the District's boundaries) and Irish and German Catholic churches just outside the boundaries. (German Catholic St. Liborius Church at 1835 North 18th Street was listed in the National Register in 1979; the Irish parish church, St. Michael's, has been demolished.) Three of the institutions were located in the circles dedicated for public use on the 1816 plat of North St. Louis. Webster School's first building (completed in 1853) was located in Circle #1, original set apart for a "Seminary of Learning." (The school's present 1906 building stands in the same circle.) Construction of Grace Episcopal's original frame church (Photo #2) was begun in 1846 in Circle #3 which had been reserved as a church and cemetery site on the 1816 plat. Organization of the church resulted from a subscription petition signed by 110 or two-thirds of the heads of families living in North St. Louis in 1844. One of the most active members involved in establishing the church and cemetery was William Christy's widow, Martha T. Christy. Other early members were predominately Anglo-Americans with the notable exception of Henry Overstolz who lived at 1301 North Market Street (demolished).³ (Grace Episcopal's present church was constructed in 1923 on the same site.) The outer ring of Circle #2 was the site of Fourth Baptist's first church, illustrated in Compton & Dry (Photo #1). The cornerstone was laid in 1858 and the building completed in 1862. Organized in 1851 through the efforts of Second Baptist Church (the parent of St. Louis Baptist congregations), Fourth Baptist's early members were also principally of Anglo-American extraction.⁴ (The church is now located at 2901-03 North 13th Street.)

Zion Lutheran Church was organized and built in 1860 as the fourth district church of Trinity Lutheran, the mother church of Lutheranism in St. Louis. The two-story red brick building at 15th and Warren Streets is the only surviving one of four German-speaking Protestant groups which built churches in the District. Until the death in 1888 of Dr. C. F. W. Walther, founder of the Lutheran Church/Missouri Synod (and considered by some the Father of Lutheranism in America), Zion Lutheran remained a district church of Walther's General Congregation in St. Louis.⁵ The congregation continued to use the church until 1895 when Zion's new church at 20th and Benton Streets was completed. The exterior of the building survives virtually unaltered (Photo #12) and features two-story pilasters rising to a large pediment on the entrance facade along with other simple classical detailing. It is the oldest Lutheran church building surviving in the city. In 1868, Zion Lutheran constructed a two-story red brick school which adjoins the south elevation of the church and, at about the same time, purchased a house at 1420 Warren Street (Photo #12-third from left) for use as a rectory.

The earliest housing surviving in Murphy-Blair (1850s) illustrates features typical of a Vernacular Classical tradition commonly used in St. Louis domestic architecture from the time the city's first brick houses were built. Usually rising two stories of hand-molded brick above rough limestone foundations, the houses employ dormered, gabled roofs and simple cornices with brick dentiling. Similar housing can be found in other nineteenth century immigrant neighborhoods on both the north and south sides of the city, although ante-bellum examples are now relatively scarce city wide. The Murphy-Blair District, however, contains the largest concentration of early row houses exhibiting flat or curved stone lintels rather than the more common red brick, segmentally arched openings. Nearby quarries once located east of the District may account for the prevalent use of stone trim in the neighborhood. The striking contrast of white stone lintels against the red brick fabric has given the District a distinct architectural character which is visible in numerous streetscapes (Photos #6 through 11).

City Block 633, the most densely built-up block in 1857, survives with several early, two-story brick houses employing stone lintels (Photo #7). Abutting row houses frequently introduce passageways ("mouseholes") which tunneled through the building from streetfront doorways to rear exterior stairs leading to second-story apartments (Photo #7-far right). A large number of residents in this block were involved in the building trades (carpenters, plasterers, bricklayers and makers) and very likely constructed the houses. Carpenter Diedrick Fangman who owned and occupied 1304-06 North Market in 1857 was a member of the building committee for Zion Lutheran Church in 1860.

Both the stone-linteled and segmentally arched row house continued to be built well into the 1870s by working-class owners. A smaller number of the houses feature wood modillioned cornices, ornamental iron balconies or classically detailed door enframements (Photos #6 & 19). One (built circa 1867) of the city's few remaining three-storied; stone-linteled buildings stands at 1412-14 Monroe Street (Photo #8).

By the early 1870s, influence of the Italianate Style could be found in the treatment of cornices, doorways and fenestration. Curved stone lintels, round arched openings and more elaborate projecting wood or corbeled brick cornices appear on otherwise planar facades. Only a few houses employ stone fronts or cast iron lintels fashionable earlier in middle- and upper-class houses (Photos #13 & 15). The cast iron lintels on 1305 Benton Street (Photo #13-second from left) most likely were manufactured by the North St. Louis Iron Works jointly owned by Rudolph Rammelkamp who built the house circa 1870.

The mansard roof, while slower to appear in working-class neighborhoods, became a highly popular roof treatment in the Murphy-Blair District. According to the Missouri Republican in 1876, this architectural feature had reached fever proportions in other parts of St. Louis by the spring of 1866,

When it was discovered that this trick of architectural adornment cost very little more money than the old way of building, it soon became the rage. How it has raged can be told by standing in any quarter of the city and counting the number of mansard roofs in sight and then reflecting that it is all the work of ten years.⁶

What the newspaper characterized as the pre-mansard spirit of St. Louis houses -- "Severely simple" brick buildings with "straight lines and plain surfaces" was still the prevailing look of Murphy-Blair and similar working-class neighborhoods (Photos #1 & 2). However, a decade later Murphy-Blair builders had caught up with other parts of St. Louis and succumbed to the mansard mania. Beginning in the mid-1880s and extending into the first decade of the twentieth century, building permits show evidence of new houses with mansard roofs as well as mansard additions to existing buildings. Indeed, few blocks in the District are without examples of the mansard roof; it was perhaps the most widely used form to attempt stylish embellishment of working-class housing (Photos #20 through 29).

By 1875, much of the District was densely built up with the exception of the northern edge which was still largely unimproved except for a flour mill and scattered brickyards (Photos #1 & 2). Population increase required the establishment in 1873 of a second public school, the Henry Ames School on Hebert Street between 13th and 14th Street (demolished); in 1866, Webster School had expanded into a second building in Circle #1. Both the old and new Webster Schools introduced German language instruction in 1866-67 as part of the School Board's effort to increase attendance of German children in the public schools.⁷ The construction of the Ames Kindergarten in 1892 (still standing at the corner of Hebert and North 13th Streets) was an indicator of the popularity of the kindergarten system, initiated in St. Louis public schools in 1873. The two-story building is one of only three known detached kindergartens surviving in the city (Photo #45). The large projecting bay on the east elevation admitted additional light and air and also may have assisted formation of the circle of chairs used extensively for classroom instruction. The use of bands of black and white glazed brick detailing the facade is a handsome example of High Victorian polychrome ornamentation also employed on a few houses in the District (Photos #42 & 43) but not commonly found in the city.

The German Military Hall Association, incorporated in 1891 by seven north side Germans, purchased the Fourth Baptist Church at the edge of Jackson Place (Circle #2) early in 1892 and hired German-born architect Henry E. Peipers to design a hall for the site. With a first-story gymnasium, second-story dance hall and stage and two-story dwelling attached at the south end, the building is unified by brick pilasters at south, west and north elevations. Like the Peters Shoe Factory additions across Jackson Place, the building employs set backs and a curved bay to accommodate the site (Photo #46). A principal feature is the entrance pediment with terra cotta tympanum bearing the words "Deutscher Militaer Halle" and emblems of Prussian military prowess.

The corporation rented the hall to the German Military Society composed of veterans of the Franco-Prussian and consolidation of German states wars. A sentimental high point for this group was the whirlwind, March 1, 1902, visit to St. Louis by Prince Henry, brother of Kaiser Wilhelm II, also a veteran of the wars. Seven members were included in a reception committee representing four Missouri vereins. Wearing war decorations and badges of the red, white and black of the German tri-color, the "scarred veterans" presented Henry an engraved scroll of greeting in the grand hall of Union Station. The press reported that Henry spoke to each of the delegations, inquiring about "where they came from in Germany, in what battles they participated, how they were prospering in this country and whether they continue to speak the German language and adhere to German principles."⁸ The German veterans met in the hall through World War I. (Owned until 1945 by heirs of one of the original incorporators, Hubert Kissell, the hall has been put to a variety of uses since the demise of the veterans including manufacturing, square dancing and religious services. At present it is occupied by an auto parts and repair company.)

Depending heavily on small-scale manufacturing, wholesaling and retailing before 1870, St. Louis' economy was greatly stimulated and diversified by German artisans, merchants and manufacturers who helped transform the city's focus from commercial to industrial by the 1870s.⁹ The German potential for contributions to the growth of industry and the building trades was already evident from the occupations of early District residents: cabinetmakers, turners, coopers, boot and shoemakers, sawmill and foundry workers, brickyard hands and stonecutters, carpenters and bricklayers as well as grocers, ice and coal merchants, draymen and laborers. Well established as the co-proprietor of a sawmill was City Comptroller Henry Overstolz who became the first German-born mayor of St. Louis in 1876. By the last quarter of the nineteenth century, north St. Louis had developed into one of the city's major centers of industry and numerous German-owned manufacturing firms had located within the Murphy-Blair District itself. Several buildings surviving in the District are associated with prominent local industries and feature architecturally significant, turn-of-the-century St. Louis industrial design while other more modest structures are representative of smaller scale enterprises which collectively made significant contributions to the city's economy.

St. Louis' furniture industry, which by 1906 was ranked fourth in the country in the value of production and first in quantity, was a large employer of District cabinetmakers and turners. Manufacture first developed in plants to the east of the District in an area which by the mid-nineteenth century was the city's primary location for lumberyards and milling operations and by the end of the century, the city's principal hardwood lumber center. By 1877, St. Louis' progress in furniture manufacture was noted by the Merchants' Exchange with the hope that St. Louis could gain control of the western markets long dominated by eastern firms.¹⁰ District resident Henry Kobush, by 1875, was operating a small plant at 2109 North 14th Street, a two-story brick structure which is still standing. In 1883, St. Louis furniture manufacturing was rated thirteenth in the city in the value of production and manufacturers had organized a Furniture Exchange which published the trade organ "The St. Louis Furniture Manufacturer." The city's progress in manufacture was attributed to production of furniture, sued to the wants of the great body of the growing West, who, no matter what may be their taste and desire for beautiful forms and decoration, must, in the main, yield to the exigencies of fortune and be content with the less substantial and less costly grades of house furnishing goods.¹¹

Credit was given "the energy, enterprise, industry and mechanical education of the German population of the city [where] at least four-fifths of the furniture manufacture, of all grades and kinds, are produced by the Germans."¹²

The Valley Furniture Company Building at the corner of Branch and 21st, is one of two major furniture factories still standing in the District (Photo #38). It was established by German cabinetmaker Clemens Eckhoff who first worked in St. Louis for Joseph Peters and in 1884, after forming a partnership with Frederick Hanpeter, built a factory at the corner of Palm and 11th (demolished). In 1893, Eckhoff left the partnership and purchased lots 13 through 30 in City Block 1158 for a factory site and four lots for lumber storage across the street on 21st Street in City Block 1159. He then began construction of his own plant as well as a mansarded house for himself at 3306 North 21st Street. The five-story structure on 21st Street and Branch, a straightforward, well-preserved example of late nineteenth century St. Louis mill construction, is articulated with ranges of segmentally arched openings and sparingly detailed with corbeled brick dentils at the cornice. Eckhoff, who specialized in the manufacture of golden oak wardrobes and cupboards, also constructed flats on his property in City Block 1158 in 1895 and 1901 and in City Block 1159 in 1909. In 1923, the factory ownership was transferred to the Valley Furniture Company which built a two-story addition at the south of the building in 1925.

Also standing in the District is the four-story Meier & Pohlmann furniture factory constructed between 1891 and 1909 along the south side of Palm Street in City Block 1142. The company was established in 1874 by German cabinetmaker John H. Meier and bookkeeper/investor John Pohlmann in a factory on Second Street near the river. In 1891, the firm relocated at the present site (formerly Frederick Steinkamper's brickworks). The designer for both the Eckhoff and Meier & Pohlmann factories was Gerhard Becker, a native of Germany who came to Missouri in 1884 and was established as an architect by 1890. He quickly earned a reputation for both factory and residential design. His houses appear in the Hyde Park District to the north as well as in Murphy-Blair. Becker was architect of Eckhoff's 1893 house at 3306 North 21st Street, a mansard with pressed metal, pedimented dormer and ornamental pressed brick cornice.

According to Arthur J. Meier, the last President of the company and grandson of the co-founder, his grandfather brought German-trained cabinetmakers to St. Louis to work in the factory, where second and third generations were employed until the plant's closing in 1959. Meier & Pohlmann specialized in oak dining room furniture and survived after 1938 by securing contracts for over fifty percent of their production from Sears, Roebuck and Montgomery Ward Companies and by obtaining favorable rail rates for the shipment of oak from the Carolinas after the Missouri oak forests were depleted. During World War II, the company lost skilled cabinetmakers, joiners and finishers to the higher wages paid by the aircraft and automotive industries where they were retrained as patternmakers and metal sprayers in war effort production. The final blow to the company came when freight rates for finished furniture were nearly tripled in the 1950s.¹³

The rapid development of St. Louis shoe manufacturing in the 1890s and rise to third place nationally by 1905 is illustrated by the growth of Peters Shoe Company which over a ten-year period constructed the impressive factory complex (Photo #39) which curves around Jackson Place (Circle #2) at the foot of North Market Street. In 1880, eastern factories were the major supplier of shoes for St. Louis wholesalers and retailers and the majority of the 184 local boot and shoemakers were small-scale neighborhood handwork and repairing operations. A significant factor contributing to the emergence of the city's shoe industry was St. Louis' large labor pool of skilled and unskilled German immigrants.

Henry W. Peters, founder of the company and son of German-born dry goods merchant Francis H. Peters, was born in St. Louis and gained wide experience in shoe merchandising through eighteen years as a salesman for Claffin-Allen Shoe Company -- a leading St. Louis wholesaler. By 1889, Peters was President of Claffin-Allen and two years later he incorporated his own company with the help of his father and uncle; clerks, salesmen and bookkeepers for the old firm joined in the new enterprise with smaller stock purchases. Construction of the first (east) section of the present factory was underway in 1891; additions to the west were made in 1896 and 1901. The 1901 (western) portion of the building was one of the last designs by August Beinke (circa 1846-1901), a second-generation German who began as a carpenter and developed a successful architectural practice noted for quality residential work. After several years in partnership with John L. Wees, Beinke practiced on his own for several years before his death.

By 1906, Peters had added another factory in Hermann, Missouri, and established an office and warehouse downtown on Washington Avenue -- later known as "Shoe Street, U.S.A." The company by then employed eighty-five salesmen to sell the Peters "Diamond Brand" shoes. Production from 1901 to 1906 had increased 270 percent; the firm advertised "$1,250,000 worth of shoes in stock all the time ready for mail orders."¹⁴ Each of the Peters' factories specialized in a different line and grade of shoes. The economy and efficiency of specialized production, large stocks on hand for immediate shipment, responsiveness to changing tastes and markets and aggressive selling distinguished the young St. Louis shoe industry from the more conservative New England manufacturers. By 1912, Peters had merged with five other St. Louis-based firms to form the International Shoe Company, St. Louis' largest single shoe company. International eventually developed into the nation's largest single shoe company with over fifty factories in several states, its own tanneries, rubber plants, warehousing and service facilities. To the east of the Peters complex in Murphy-Blair, the former Ramelose Shoe Company's 1890s factory at 2301 North 11th Street was leased for production of dyes and polishes. The merged companies continued to produce and promote their products with independent trademarks and sales force, an arrangement which generated competitiveness in production and sales. The Murphy-Blair plant was closed in the 1930s as International established rural factories. It was subsequently bought by the Sussman Wiping Material Company and is presently used as an egg carton warehouse.

St. Louis' booming shoe industry spawned numerous producers of supplies and equipment. One was the St. Louis Last Company which was established in City Block 1143 by 1897. The present contributing structure (3017 North 13th), a three-story brick structure with windows paired below wide, segmental arches, was constructed in the late teens (Photo #51-background).

Kegs, barrels and hogsheads required for St. Louis' extensive retailing and wholesaling of processed foodstuffs were produced in numerous (usually small) cooperages in many parts of St. Louis. There were at least eight in the Murphy-Blair District but part of only one survives. The most extensive cooperage was begun in the early 1870s by William Schaperkoetter, eventually filling the southwestern quadrants of City Block 1125, with a warehouse across Montgomery Street added in 1881. Later operated by Henry Schaperkoetter, it was the only cooperage listed in the City Directory of 1887 as a producer of machine-made barrels. The remaining building, a two-story brick structure at 2708-10 North 113th, was built circa 1910 with frame boarding and a 24-foot-high opening in the front to accommodate barrel-laden wagons. Another moderately sized building at the southern edge of the District (1424 Chambers) was once part of the City Brewery, a large complex established by German-born Charles Stifel in 1859. Built circa 1902, the one-story brick structure with finished parapet recalls typical St. Louis brewery design and is the sole surviving building associated with the brewery. In 1889, the brewery was consolidated with several others in St. Louis as the St. Louis Brewery Association but it continued to operate under the management of Stifel's son, Otto. When Polish immigrants began replacing Germans at the southern part of the District early in the twentieth century, the brewery provided convenient employment.

The last major manufacturing concern begun in the District was Charles Maull's spaghetti and macaroni factory constructed between 1903 and 1907 at 1227-31 St. Louis Avenue (Photo #40). A native of Alsace, Maull was first listed in the 1872 St. Louis City Directory as a porter living at 1415 Warren. He began manufacturing vermicelli on a modest scale by 1881 and in 1883, opened a small factory on South Sixth Street; the site for the present factory (land which had been owned since 1854 by quarryman Hugh Carlin and his heirs) was bought by Maull in 1901. Charles Maull, Jr. began work for his father in 1888, became his partner two years later and took over the presidency of the company after his father's death in 1917. Marketed by the 1920s under the brand name of "Faust," the macaroni, spaghetti, vermicelli and egg noodles manufactured at the plant were "made from Durum wheat, air-tight packed and sealed . . . and shipped to almost every part of the globe."¹⁵ The business was sold in 1929 to the Kansas City Macaroni Importing Firm (later renamed the American Beauty Macaroni Company). Since 1970, the building has been owned by James Lockhart, proprietor of a used furniture company. Designed by Charles F. May, the building was constructed in two stages; the first two stories were built in 1903 with the upper two added in 1907. The design of the twelve-bay front elevation is distinguished by a three-part vertical division established by slightly stepping back the middle section and treating the corner bays as pavillions crowned with gables. May, a second-generation German born in St. Louis in 1854 and a member of the American Institute of Architects, was trained in the office of the eminent St. Louis architect George I. Barnett. Beginning in the mid-1870s, he developed a city-wide reputation, particularly among Germans, and was frequently hired to design buildings for Lutheran institutions. May was architect also of several houses and factories in the District.

By the turn of the century, 14th Street (from North Market to St. Louis Avenue) had developed as the District's shopping area. As early as 1881, Francis H. Peters and his brother Frederick, dry goods merchants with a store at 14th and Clinton, built a new, mansarded, two-story building with living quarters above at the northeast corner of 14th and Warren. Their store fronted on the north/south-running 14th Street. Known as the "pioneers of 14th Street," the German-born Peters brothers sold both ready-made and made-to-order men's clothing, and employed as many as forty tailors at one time. An addition to the building doubled their 14th Street frontage in 1888. The now-boarded structure with handsome, bracketed, wood cornice is visible in the right foreground of Photo #35. Following the Peters' lead, Hoffman Hardware Company in 1890 constructed a three-story brick store and dwelling at the northwest corner of Benton and 14th Street, and the next year added a two-story brick store to the north on 14th Street. H. J. Marx, who had worked for the firm since 1886, took over the store at 2501-09 North 14th. His descendants are still operating the business. The main building employs traditional red brick, segmentally arched window openings, a brickwork cornice and cast iron storefront. (Not illustrated.)

More up-to-date commercial design and building materials were introduced to the District with a three-story, 1895 store with upstairs apartments at 2605 North 14th Street. It was built for the Whittaker and Weber Company, whose houseware business was bought out and incorporated as the American Stove and Queensware Company by J. C. Steiner in 1901. Designed by architect Charles F. May, the building features fashionable buff brick articulated with arches of ornamental brick in a dog-tooth pattern springing from ornamental stone capitals. Ornamental pressed brick patterns also enrich the cornice and parapet of the flat-roofed structure (Photo #35-second from left).

Perhaps influenced by the improvements nearby on 14th Street, J. C. Geitz Sewing Machine and Furniture Store at 1315-19 North Market Street improved its retailing facilities in 1901 with a buff brick, three-story building with ornamental pressed brick trim divided by pilasters into three, wide bays at the second and third stories. (Not illustrated.) Geitz was born in Germany and moved to St. Louis after thirty years in Warsaw, Illinois. His firm was established in the District by the early 1880s. His son Gottlieb expanded the business with stores to the northeast and at the edge of the downtown business district to the south. At the North Market Street store, bedroom and dining room sets were displayed in the generous storefront windows framed by cast iron. Geitz also featured the latest in labor-saving home appliances, such as oscillating and vibrating White sewing machines and a recently patented ball-bearing washing machine. Architects for the Geitz building were William E. Matthews and Albert O. Clarke. Matthews (born circa 1857) was a resident of the District until circa 1890. His early training was with German-born St. Louis architect F. William Raeder. Later he worked in the office of the fashionable J. B. Legg Architectural Company, where Clarke was employed also. The partnership was formed in 1892. Matthews lived first at 2810 North 12th Street (demolished) and from 1877 to 1884 at 1405 Hebert, later moving to 1209 Montgomery.

By 1902, 14th Street merchants had formed their own association. Following the installation of street lights by this businessmen's organization in the early twentieth century, the commercial strip became known as "The Great White Way." In 1906, downtown real estate investors Korte & Rust built an elaborately ornamented store and office building on 14th Street and Benton. Described as the first of its kind in north St. Louis, the $60,000 "Korte Building" was designed with five large storefronts on 14th Street and twenty suites of offices on the second floor for doctors, dentists and oculists (Photo #36, right foreground).¹⁷ The building was designed by architects Frederick Widmann and Robert Walsh, both members of the American Institute of Architects. The firm received commissions for houses of affluent St. Louisans (both Anglo and German) as well as for major breweries -- (Anheuser-Busch Brewery on the city's south side, the Brinckwirth-Nolker Brewery to the west of the District as well as the 1902 Stifel brewery building in the District). They were the probable architects of the 1906 Louis Brinckwirth Building of stores and flats at the southwest corner of 14th and North Market Streets.

In the 1920s, and later, the 14th Street commercial strip continued to be rejuvenated either through facade alterations or completely new buildings. One of the last major new stores of the period of significance was the 1925 Kassing-Goosens Home Furnishings Company at 2707-09 North 14th. The firm was the successor to one established in 1888 by German-born Henry Kassing and located for twenty years in a mansarded store/dwelling a block to the north. The new, two-story building, designed by architects Wedemeyer & Nelson, represented an innovation on 14th Street: the generous expanse of glass (now boarded) provided by the three, broadly arched, second-story bays of transomed windows permitted the display of merchandise above the first-story storefront. (Photo #35-third from left).

More modest was the one-story, two-bay store at 2516 North 14th built in 1929 by dry goods merchant Morris Fixman and enlivened by Gothic terra cotta trim and brickwork patterning at the parapet (Photo #37-center). To the north (left) is the former residence and grocery store occupied by Eberhard Deuper by 1869, once fronting on Warren. (The Deupers altered the building to front on 14th Street in 1901 and made further changes in 1907.) The present buff brick facade with terra cotta trimmed parapet was installed in 1924 for Morris Fixman.

In its heyday, 14th Street provided all the conceivable goods and services required by the District's residents ranging from groceries, clothing, hardware and appliances to medical care, flowers, beauty parlors, barbers and candy. The strip is now almost moribund, in spite of the creation of a mall between St. Louis Avenue and Warren in the 1970s. The most flourishing business today is the unchanging Crown Candy Company at the northwest corner of 14th and St. Louis Avenue. The building was erected in 1880 as a store/dwelling by Charles Schlueter, who made storefront alterations in 1911. Harry Karandzieff, an immigrant from Macedonia, opened his candy store and ice cream parlor there in 1913 (Photo #11-foreground).

In 1906, Webster School replaced the two old school building in Circle #1 with a new, four-story brick school (Photos #47 & 48) designed by architect William B. Ittner, FAIA (1864-1936). Commissioner of School Buildings from 1896 to 1910 and then Architect for the St. Louis Board of Education, Ittner's reforms in school design brought him national prominence and commissions for schools in twenty-nine states by the end of his career. Webster School, one of Ittner's earliest extant progressive designs, illustrates the architect's highly praised "open plan" which provided improved classroom and corridor space, light and ventilation; the building was also installed with mechanical and sanitation systems advanced for the time. Ittner's interest in upgrading the exterior design is illustrated in Webster School as well. The son of a prominent, local brick manufacturer and builder, the architect was early introduced to the artistic potential of brick which he made further study of in England's public school buildings. Laid with imperfect brick in varied shades of red, Webster School departed from the uniform, smooth, red brick conventionally used in St. Louis schools. The building's use of arcading and twin towers are examples of Ittner's efforts to impart individual identities to school buildings through various stylistic idioms.

Shortly after the turn of the century, changes in the District were also apparent in Marion Place (Circle #3) where the old parish of Grace Episcopal Church was re-directing its effort into neighborhood social service work. As a result of declining membership, Grace Episcopal in 1910 merged with Holy Cross Corporation, a mission sponsored by the Episcopal Diocese of Missouri. Already actively involved in the treatment of alcoholism on the city's north side by 1905, Holy Cross Mission, in 1910, opened a Dispensary in the basement of a building erected by Grace Episcopal circa 1905 directly north of the Church and offered general medical care to the neighborhood. Within a few years, the group's services required the use of a second building at 2502 North 12th Street, a two-story brick building with Georgian detailing. While Holy Cross continued to meet neighborhood needs with club activities, a kindergarten and nursery school in addition to clinics, the mission's religious work was furthered with the construction of a new stone church in 1923 which replaced the original which had been destroyed by fire.¹⁸ Designed by the prestigious St. Louis architectural firm Jamieson & Spearl, the Gothic Revival church introduced High Art architectural design into a stronghold of conservative vernacular traditions (Photo #49). Both trained at the University of Pennsylvania and in the office of Cope & Stewardson, James F. Jamieson and George W. Spearl worked on plans for buildings at Washington University in St. Louis where Jamieson was sent to supervise construction and open a branch office of the Philadelphia firm in 1900. After establishing their own practice in St. Louis circa 1920, Jamieson & Spearl designed numerous homes for prominent St. Louisans, the Episcopal Church of St. Michael & St. George in St. Louis County, buildings for Washington University, the University of Missouri in Columbia, Princeton University and Bryn Mawr College. The new rectory constructed in 1927 in the northwest quadrant of Marion Place added another High Art anomaly in the District. Featuring Tudor Revival detailing, the moderately sized house followed stylistic fashions popular in suburban houses designed for affluent clients of St. Louis architects Maritz & Young who supplied plans for the rectory.

Despite gradual demographic shifts which removed the Anglo-American, Protestant element at the eastern edge of Murphy-Blair and introduced Polish Catholics on the southern boundary, the District remained a stable, working-class neighborhood. Area ethnic churches continued to thrive: Irish Catholic St. Michael's constructed a new parochial school in 1928 at 2501-03 North 11th Street (Photo #52-left) and German Catholic St. Liborius boasted a large membership whose German element was still strong enough in the 1930s to support parish bulletins published in both English and German and a monthly German mass. In 1935, the District was chosen as the site of the last public bath house constructed in the city. Using Federal PWA and City Bond funds, the $41,688 facility at 1120 St. Louis Avenue incorporated the foundations and some walls of Fire Station #19 which had been there since the late 1870s (Photo #53).

Plans for Municipal Bath House #6 were drawn under the supervision of Building Commissioner Albert Osburg. The facade of the one-story building is simply ornamented with light gray terra cotta pilasters; frieze and door enframements employ Art Deco motifs popular in the 1930s. Interior plans called for an entrance counter where towels could be rented and soap purchased. The bath house provided eighteen marble-clad dressing stalls for women and sixteen for men. Statistics for the first full year of operation indicate that it was the most extensively used of the city's bath houses, with 170,180 baths provided.¹⁹ Closed in the late 1950s, Bath House #6 is the only extant bath house on the city's north side.

The World War II era marked the beginning of the neighborhood's sharpest decline. War industry jobs attracted poor rural migrants (both white and black) to the area and many of the older residents flocked to the suburbs. A major turning point, however, occurred in the 1950s when Interstate 70 (Mark Twain Expressway) cut a swath through the north side and formed the eastern boundary of the Murphy-Blair District. As a former resident of the area recalled:

. . . the ordinarily optimistic air of the hardworking householders of the North Side had already suffered a serious blow. Nobody talked about it much, but the same thought seemed to be on a lot of minds: if this can happen -- I-70 dividing and destroying the neighborhood -- then anything can happen. The last mass at St. Michael's which stood where the overhead sign marking the St. Louis Avenue exit from westbound I-70 now hangs seemed as much a wake for the neighborhood as for St. Michael's.²⁰

In 1961, the Board of Aldermen declared the area blighted and Murphy-Blair became a Model City neighborhood in 1968. Statistics for the decade between 1960 and 1970 reported a drop in population from 14,471 to 9,925, the demolition of 650 living units and no new construction. The majority of neighborhood buildings were described by the St. Louis Plan Commission circa 1970 as violating housing codes; vacant lots and structures were greatly increasing on the southern edge.²¹ However, despite all the signs of a decaying neighborhood, a 1974, St. Louis Post-Dispatch feature article on Murphy-Blair found a "tough cocky little neighborhood" with a "crusty group" of residents, both black and white, determined to "hang on" until the neighborhood experienced a comeback.²² Among the city's best remaining concentrations of nineteenth century vernacular architecture, Murphy-Blair's rich resources of historic buildings are slowly attracting new residents to the neighborhood. It is hoped by all that listing in the National Register will stimulate settlement, investment and rehabilitation.

FOOTNOTES

¹Missouri Republican, 14 March 1856.

²By 1855, both North St. Louis and Bremen had been absorbed by the City of St. Louis. The sixty-seven Icarians occupying a two-story brick house on Hadley Street in City Block 639 (demolished) were one of three groups established in St. Louis in 1856 following the expulsion of Etienne Cabet and about 220 loyal followers from the former Mormon village in Nauvoo, Illinois. The Hadley Street establishment, described as a "printing office and dwelling," included a printer, a gardener, a cook and a baker. Wages earned by nineteen tailors, two dyers, a patternmaker, an architect, a carpenter, a sawyer, two coopers, two cabinetmakers and a clerk were pooled. By 1858, the three households had pooled their resources and moved to the southwestern part of the city.
